In 1879, Joseph Page being then dead, Amy Page entered into an agreement with the Midland Rail. Co. for the sale to them of the "Little Piece" for £5,250, and the sale was carried out by an indenture dated June 26, 1879, and made between John Hazlehurst, A. P. Shelley, T. F. Hazlehurst, of the first part, Amy Page, of the second part, and the Midland Rail. Co., of the third part. The will of Ann Palmer was recited, and also the mortgage, the further charge, the transfer, and the death of Joseph Page. It was then recited that the company requiring, and by the Midland Rail. Co. (New Works) Act, 1877, being empowered, to take and purchase for the purposes of the railway the piece of land called the "Little Piece," had B

"entered into an agreement with the said Amy Page for the purchase thereof for an estate of inheritance in fee simple in possession free from incumbrances, at the price of £5,250." C

It was also recited that the sum of £2,200 remained due on the mortgage and further charge, and that it had been agreed that that sum should be paid off out of the purchase money. It was then witnessed that, in pursuance of the said agreements, and in consideration of £2,200 paid to the parties, of the first part, and also D

"in consideration of the sum of £3,050 to the said Amy Page, paid by the said company on or before the execution of these presents," they the said John Hazlehurst, A. P. Shelley, and Thomas F. Hazlehurst, at the request and by the direction of the said Amy Page, do, and each of them doth hereby grant and release, and she, the said Amy Page, doth hereby grant and confirm unto the said company, their successors and assigns, the piece of land called "Little Piece," and E

"all such estate, right, title, and interest in and to the same as the said John Hazlehurst, A. P. Shelley, Thomas F. Hazlehurst, and Amy Page, or either of them, are, or is, or shall become seised or possessed of, or are or is by the said Act or otherwise empowered to convey," F to hold the same unto and to the use of the company, their successors and assigns. The indenture contained the following covenant:

"And the said Amy Page doth hereby for herself, her heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant with the said company, their successors and assigns, that notwithstanding any act or thing by the said Amy Page or the said Ann Palmer deceased, or any of her ancestors or testators, or any of them, made, done, or executed, or knowingly suffered, the said John Hazlehurst, Abraham Parker Shelley, and Thomas Francis Hazlehurst, or some or one of them, now have or hath good right and full power to grant and release, and the said Amy Page now hath good power to grant and confirm, the said hereditaments and premises hereinbefore expressed to be granted or otherwise assured to the use of the said company, their successors and assigns, in manner aforesaid; and that the same hereditaments and premises shall at all times hereafter remain and be to the use of the said company, their successors and assigns, and be quietly entered into and upon, and held, occupied, and enjoyed, and the rents and profits thereof received and taken by the said company, their successors and assigns, accordingly, without any lawful interruption by the said Amy Page, or any person lawfully or equitably claiming by, from, under, or in trust for her, or by, from, or under the said Ann Palmer deceased, or by, from, or under any of her ancestors or testators, or any of them; and that free and discharged, or otherwise, by the said Amy Page, her heirs, executors, and administrators sufficiently indemnified from and against all estates, encumbrances, claims, and demands whatsoever, either already or hereafter to be made, occasioned, or suffered by the said Amy Page or any person lawfully or G
H
I

- A equitably claiming by, from, under, or in trust for her, or by, from, or under the said Ann Palmer deceased, or by, from, or under any of her ancestors or testators, or any of them."

Then followed a covenant for further assurance. On the same day Joseph Page the younger, a son of Amy Page, gave the company an indemnity against all damages, costs, charges, and expenses which they might sustain or be put to by reason of any claims or demands made by any children or other issue of Amy Page by reason of the purchase money being paid to Amy Page.

- B Amy Page died on July 27, 1891. William Palmer Page, her eldest son, died on Oct. 20, 1889, leaving a widow and two children, W. J. Page, and Helen Page, and under the will of W. P. Page his children were entitled to all his interest under the will of his deceased grandmother, Ann Palmer, in equal shares, W. J. Page being also the heir-at-law of W. P. Page.

- C On Dec. 22, 1892, this action was commenced by W. J. Page and Helen Page against the Midland Rail. Co., claiming to recover possession of one undivided third share of the "Little Piece," or, in the alternative, payment to them by the company of one-third of the £3,050 paid by the company to Amy Page. In their statement of claim the plaintiffs stated that they were willing that the conveyance to the company of June 26, 1879, should stand upon payment to them by the defendant company of one-third part of the £3,050. The plaintiffs claimed on the ground that on the true construction of Ann Palmer's will Amy Page was only tenant for life of the land sold to the company. By their defence the company contended that they obtained a good title under the deed of June 26, 1879. They, however, obtained leave to serve a third-party notice on the executors of Amy Page, claiming to be indemnified out of her estate under her covenants for title; and also to serve a similar notice on Joseph Page, the younger, claiming to be indemnified by him under his indemnity to them. The third parties appeared and took part in the trial. The action was tried by ROMER, J., who gave judgment for the plaintiffs, directing the company to pay them one-third of the £3,050, together with interest and costs, and he ordered Joseph Page the younger to repay the company the amount paid by them to the plaintiffs, together with costs. His Lordship dismissed with costs the claim of the company against the executors of Amy Page, as he felt himself bound to follow Hunt v. White (1). The company appealed against the judgment on both points.

- E The first appeal turned on the construction of the word "hereafter" in the will of Ann Palmer, and does not call for a report. This appeal was dismissed on Oct. 27, 1893, and the decision that the company were liable to pay the plaintiffs one-third of £3,050 was affirmed. The appeal from the decision that the executors of Amy Page were not liable to indemnify the company was then heard.

I Nov. 9, 1893. The following judgments were read.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a portion of a judgment of ROMER, J., which decided that the Midland Rail. Co. was not entitled to any relief in respect of a covenant for title entered into by one Amy Page, who sold some land to them.

The circumstances giving rise to the company's claim were shortly as follows. One Ann Palmer devised certain lands to Amy Page, but in such language as to render it doubtful whether she was absolutely entitled to the purchase money paid by the Midland Rail. Co. who bought some of this land from her and took a conveyance from her in fee and paid her the price of the fee. By the deed of conveyance she entered into the usual covenants for title. Amy Page died in 1891, and an action was brought by persons claiming the land under Ann Palmer's will upon the footing that Amy Page was only tenant for life, and that on her death the land vested in the plaintiffs. The railway company contested this claim, relying on the terms of Ann Palmer's will; but the railway company also brought in Amy Page's executors as third parties and claimed to be indemnified by them under her covenants for title in the event of its being decided that Amy Page was not absolutely entitled to the purchase money. ROMER, J., first, and this court afterwards, decided that Amy Page was not entitled to give a discharge for the purchase money. The result of this decision was that the plaintiffs in the action recovered the value of one-third part of the land from the company, but ROMER, J., further decided that the railway company had no remedy against Amy Page's representatives under her covenants for title. This is the point which we have now to determine.

Before addressing myself to this question, it is important to observe that the conveyance by Amy Page to the company was made by her as an ordinary vendor in fee. The conveyance was not made by her under the statutory powers conferred on tenants for life by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; nor was the purchase money paid into a bank pursuant to those sections in the same Act which apply to purchasers from tenants for life and persons whose titles are doubtful. Moreover, the railway company did not by their pleadings or at the Bar claim to have acquired a good title under that statute, or contend that the plaintiffs' remedy, if any, was for compensation under s. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; nor did the third parties, Amy Page's representatives, raise any such point. Both in the court below and in this court the case has been fought on different lines; and the only controversy has been respecting the true construction of Ann Palmer's will, and the true construction and effect of Amy Page's conveyance to the defendant company. I think it necessary to call attention to these facts, in order to prevent misconception as to the scope of the present decision.

I say nothing on the point whether the defendant company could or could not have defended the action brought against them on the ground that the company had obtained a good statutory title, and that the plaintiffs' proper course was to proceed to obtain compensation under s. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; nor do I say anything on the point whether, having regard to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, the plaintiffs have any title to any estate or interest in the land conveyed to the company as distinguished from a claim for compensation under s. 68. ROMER, J., decided that Amy Page's covenants for title did not protect the company from the plaintiff's claim, because Ann Palmer's will was recited in the conveyance to the company, and because the covenants for title ought to be confined to defects in the vendor's title not shown on the conveyance. In so deciding ROMER, J., followed a decision of MALINS, V.-C., in 1868, viz., Hunt v. White (1), which he did not consider himself at liberty to depart from, and the question we have to determine is whether the principle on which that case was decided ought to be upheld or not. If that case had been generally followed as correct, I for one should not think it right now to disturb it even if I did not approve it. But, singularly enough, the decision seems to have been lost sight of. The case does not appear ever to have been cited in court; nor is it to be found in the textbooks on real property and conveyancing which legal practitioners are in the habit of consulting. The note in MR. DART'S book on VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (6th Edn.), vol. 2, at p. 886, shows that eminent conveyancers at all events regard the principle on which the Vice-Chancellor proceeded as by no means settled. Under these circumstances this court ought, in my opinion, to treat the question as still open, and to decide it on sound principles of construction.

To what is a vendor's covenant for title applicable? Is it to the title shown to

A the purchaser, or is it to the title expressed to be conveyed to him? The answer to this question can only be found by reading the whole conveyance including the covenant for title. If, on the true construction of the whole document, the title conveyed is clear and the covenant is so worded as to apply to the title so conveyed, then, although the recitals may show some defect or uncertainty in the vendor's title, effect ought to be given to the words of the covenant so as to give

B to the purchaser the title which the deed shows he was to have. In the case supposed there is no warrant for giving the words a more restricted meaning than that which they ordinarily bear; no warrant for qualifying the acts covenanted against by inserting "save as herein appears," or "save as shown by the abstract," or "save as explained before the execution of this deed," or any words to any such effect. If a vendor does not intend that his covenant for title shall extend to

C defects disclosed to the purchaser, whether on the face of the deed or aliunde, the vendor must take care not to word his covenant so as in terms to cover such defects; or he must insert some clause in the deed clearly explaining and controlling his covenant. This is in accordance with ordinary rules of construction and with fair dealing. No doubt a purchaser is well advised to make the matter plain by inserting words to show that even defects known to him are intended

D to be covered; and this is what conveyancers have advised for years (see BUTLER's note to Co. LITT. 384a and the other works cited by the counsel for the defendant company). But they have advised this course only as a matter of prudence and precaution. Apart from Hunt v. White (1) there is no authority for not giving effect to the clear and express words of a vendor's covenants for title, simply because a defect covered by them was disclosed by a recital in the conveyance. The principle on

E which that case was decided is, in my opinion, manifestly unsound.

I pass now to Amy Page's conveyance itself. The words of the conveyance and covenant for title are quite clear and unambiguous, and the covenant clearly extends to claims by persons deriving title through Ann Palmer. The insertion of the words "Ann Palmer" in the covenant for title is, I think, significant. They may, no doubt, have been put in to cover unknown acts done by her, but they are

F not really wanted for this purpose, and they may well have been put in to emphasise the fact that the covenant was really intended to extend to her acts in particular as well as to those of the vendor and her other predecessors in title. The fact that in this case the company took a separate indemnity from a third person cannot affect the construction of the vendor's covenant. I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed, and that the order of ROMER, J., should

G be varied by declaring that the company are entitled to be indemnified by the representatives of Ann Page; that the indemnity must be confined to the value of the land claimed by the plaintiffs, i.e., £1,016 13s. 4d. and interest from the death of the tenant for life, and not extend to the costs of the plaintiffs which the defendant company have been ordered to pay. These costs could not, I apprehend, be recovered by the railway company in an action at law on the covenant. The

H executors of Amy Page must pay the costs of the appeal and of the proceedings against them.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J. I entirely agree with it, and have nothing to add.

I DAVEY, L.J.—The question in this appeal is whether the railway company have a right under the covenants for title contained in a conveyance to them of June 26, 1879, to be indemnified by the representatives of Mrs. Amy Page against the claim of the plaintiffs in the action which, in the previous appeal, we have held to be well founded in law.

The conveyance in question is made between certain mortgagees of Amy Page and her husband and children, of the first part, Amy Page, of the second part, and the railway company, of the third part. It contains a full recital of the will of Ann Palmer under which Amy Page and the plaintiffs derive title, and under which the question of title arises. There was, therefore, full notice on the face of the instrument of the nature and grounds of the claim made by Amy Page and of the title of the plaintiffs. There is a recital of an agreement with Amy Page for the purchase of the land for an estate of inheritance in fee simple free from all encumbrances, but the deed contains no express recital of an intention to protect the railway company by the covenant for title from any claim by the plaintiffs. By the operative part it is witnessed that, in consideration of £2,200 paid to the mortgagees, and the further sum of £3,050 paid to Amy Page, she and her mortgagees convey to the company in fee simple, and then follow the covenants for title. We have determined in the first appeal that Amy Page had no power to give the company a discharge for the purchase money, and the plaintiffs in the events which have happened have a right to claim it against the railway company in some form of action. Under these circumstances the company claim to be indemnified by the representatives of Amy Page against the claim of the plaintiffs. It may be mentioned that at the time of the conveyance the company took an indemnity from one of the beneficiaries.

It is not disputed on the pleadings or by counsel at the Bar that the claim of the plaintiffs is "a claim or demand made by a person claiming under Ann Palmer" against or in respect of the lands in question, or that it is occasioned by an "act or thing made, done, or executed by Ann Palmer," or (in other words) that there would be a breach of the covenant if it is to be construed literally. But it is said that, assuming this to be so, we ought to construe the covenant so as not to cover any claim or demand arising out of matters appearing on the face of the conveyance. The question which we have to decide, therefore, is (assuming there would otherwise be a breach of the covenant): Ought we to read into the covenant by construction an exception of defects of title or encumbrances appearing on the face of the instrument, or to imply the words "save as appears by those presents," or similar words?

In support of the argument of the representatives of Amy Page, Hunt v. White (1), decided by MALINS, V.-C., in 1868, has been referred to, and ROMER, J., felt himself bound by this authority, and decided accordingly without expressing any opinion of his own. It is conceded that there is no other authority on the point, and, although it might be possible to distinguish Hunt v. White (1) in one respect, I am of opinion that the Vice-Chancellor intended to decide the case before him on general grounds. He says (37 L.J.Ch. at pp. 327, 328):

"If the object had been that the vendor was in all events to guarantee the purchaser's title, the covenants for title should have been extended by express words to meet that case. . . . The covenant for quiet enjoyment can only extend to protect the purchaser from encumbrances and defects in the title, of which the purchaser has no notice. . . . Where the title is made under a written instrument the purchaser must put his construction upon the instrument, and must be bound thereby. It would be a perversion of law to say that the covenant extended to cover such a case as this, viz., the misconstruction by a purchaser of the written instrument under which he takes his title and conveyance."

The Vice-Chancellor was himself a conveyancer of considerable experience, and his opinion upon such a point is entitled to the highest respect. But still it is only the learned judge's opinion, and we are bound to express our opinion whether we agree with it. The Vice-Chancellor's proposition is certainly expressed too widely, for where the defect of title is one of which the purchaser has notice, though it does not appear on the face of the conveyance, it was held in Levett v. Withrington (2) that notice of the defect in title relied on as a breach is no defence to an action on the covenant in respect of the breach.

I adopt the statement of the learned editors of DART ON VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (6th Edn.), vol. 2, at p. 886, and it would, in my opinion, be contrary to principle to hold that the construction or effect of a covenant can be controllable by extrinsic

A evidence of notice or intention. The Vice-Chancellor's opinion, however, seems to be based on the fact of notice independently of the source from which it is derived. Various opinions of text writers on conveyancing were referred to in the course of the argument, the most important of which is MR. BUTLER's note to Co. LITT. 384a. He says:

B "It sometimes happens that a purchaser consents to take a defective title, relying for his security on the vendor's covenants. Where this is the case, this should be particularly mentioned to be the agreement of the parties; as it has been argued that, as the defect in question was known, it must be understood to have been the agreement of the purchaser to take the title subject to it; and that the covenants for title should not extend to warrant it against this particular defect."

C It does not appear to me that this passage, or the passages read from the other works, really assist the court, as they seem to me to amount to nothing more than a salutary caution by the learned authors to the practitioner, and I agree with the note in DART ON VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (6th Edn.), vol. 2, at p. 886 (g).

Looking at the question, therefore, unfettered by binding authority, I am of opinion that it is safer and more consistent with principle to construe the covenant literally without importing into it any exception or qualifications which the parties have not themselves introduced by express words, and to say that, if the parties do not intend the covenant to be so construed for the protection of the purchaser, they should express their intention, instead of throwing upon those who maintain that the covenant should be read according to the ordinary use of language, the onus of finding an expressed intention to that effect. I may add that I think this construction is at least as likely to be in accordance with the intention of the parties as the construction contended for at the Bar. I am, therefore, of opinion that the general rule laid down in Hunt v. White (1) cannot be supported, and, notwithstanding that the case has been on the books for twenty-five years, I think we ought not to follow it. It is not even referred to in DART ON VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (6th Edn.), and it does not appear to have been extensively known, and I cannot conceive that any titles depend upon it. The result will be that the claim of the railway company against the representatives of Amy Page ought, in our opinion, to succeed, and we must reverse the judgment, though I do not know that we are differing from the opinion of the learned judge in the court below.

Appeal by Keighley, Maxsted & Co. from an order of the Divisional Court (MATHEW and BRUCE, JJ.), remitting an award to the appeal committee of the London Corn Trade Association.

Keighley, Maxsted & Co. contracted, in writing, to purchase from Bryan Durant & Co. 3,000 tons of Karachi wheat, more or less, to be delivered to one safe floating port direct in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both included, but Calais and Rouen excluded. Ralli & Co. shipped 3,800 tons of Karachi wheat on board the steamship Bombay, and Bryan Durant & Co. wrote to Keighley, Maxsted & Co. informing them that they had appropriated 3,000

A tons of this wheat to their contract with them. By the terms of the charterparty, under which Ralli & Co. had chartered the Bombay, the Bombay was to discharge at any safe port in the United Kingdom, except at Sharpness and Bristol Old Dock. Keighley, Maxsted & Co. gave notice to Bryan Durant & Co. to discharge the 3,000 tons of wheat at Sharpness. An arrangement was thereupon made by Ralli & Co. with the shipowners by which the charterparty was modified so as to enable
B the Bombay to discharge at Sharpness, the shipowners reserving the full right to claim for all extra expenses, loss, or damage which might be occasioned by reason of the vessel going to Sharpness, and the charterers undertaking to pay the same. This arrangement was endorsed upon the charterparty. Keighley, Maxsted & Co. refused to accept delivery.

By the contract it was provided that

C "All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract... shall be referred according to the rules endorsed on this contract, and this stipulation may be made a rule of any of the Divisions of the High Court."

On the back of the contract was endorsed :

D "All disputes arising out of this contract shall be from time to time referred to two arbitrators, one to be chosen by each party in difference, the two arbitrators having power to call in a third in case they shall deem it necessary."

The dispute was referred under that rule, and the arbitrators made their award in favour of Keighley, Maxsted & Co. upon the ground that the alteration in the charterparty threw fresh liabilities upon the purchasers of the wheat. By the

E rules endorsed upon the contract it was provided that the award of any two arbitrators in writing (subject only to the right of appeal thereafter mentioned) should be conclusive and binding upon all disputing parties; that in case either party should be dissatisfied with the award an appeal should lie to the committee of appeal elected for that purpose, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the London Corn Trade Association; that the committee of appeal should

F confirm the award unless four of the members appointed to hear such appeal decided to vary the award; and that such committee should consist of five members to hear such appeal. Bryan Durant & Co. appealed to the committee of appeal, who confirmed the award of the arbitrators. Bryan Durrant & Co. applied to GORELL BARNES, J., at chambers, for an order remitting the matter for reconsideration by the appeal committee, upon an affidavit by Mr. Durant, which stated

G that, since the award of the appeal committee he had discovered that, after the making of the award, the shipowners had written to the charterers saying that by the endorsement upon the charterparty it was not intended that the consignees of the cargo, other than the charterers themselves, should be liable for any of the extra expenses, etc., the charterers being personally liable to the steamer for such extra expenses, the cargo's liability being limited to freight, and that the ship-

H owners' solicitors had written confirming this statement, and that the charterers had replied confirming and accepting such statement. The affidavit also stated that some of the members of the committee of appeal had said that, if such evidence had been before them, their decision would have been in favour of Bryan Durant & Co. GORELL BARNES, J., refused to make the order, but the Divisional Court (MATHEW and BRUCE, JJ.), on appeal, made an order remitting the matter
I to the reconsideration of the committee of appeal. Messrs. Keighley, Maxsted & Co. appealed.

By the Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 10 (1) :

"In all cases of reference to arbitration the court or a judge may from time to time remit the matters referred, or any of them, to the re-consideration of the arbitrators or umpire."

Cohen, Q.C., and Carver for Keighley, Maxsted & Co.

Finlay, Q.C., and Pollard for Bryan Durant & Co., were not called on to argue.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the parties to an arbitration were related to each other by a contract for the purchase and sale of wheat. A dispute arose in connection with that contract which raised the question whether the purchasers were bound to accept a cargo of wheat on board ship at Sharpness. In the contract of purchase and sale the parties agreed to refer all disputes to arbitrators chosen from the corn trade, subject to the condition that their award should be final and conclusive between the parties, but that if either party wished to go further and be heard before certain umpires he could do so by way of appeal. Those umpires were to be the committee of the London Corn Trade Association. This case went before the arbitrators, who gave their decision. One of the parties desired to go before the umpires. The parties had agreed that the committee should act according to its usual rules by which a panel of five was to act as umpires, and if one of those five died before a final determination was made, another was to be put in his place. The case then went before five members of the committee acting as umpires; one of those five has died, but another can and will be put in his place. There was a determination by this committee of five and prima facie that determination must be treated as final and conclusive between the parties, and not subject to any revision by a court of law. One party has, however, asked the court to remit this award to the umpires, under the provisions of s. 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889 [re-enacted by s. 22 of Arbitration Act, 1950: 29 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 89].

In my opinion, this was an arbitration. The case, therefore, comes within the Arbitration Act, and we have to see whether the circumstances will justify a remittal to the umpires to re-consider the case. The Arbitration Act, 1889, has, in a great measure, followed the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, as to arbitrations. If any part of the later Act is enacted in the same terms as the earlier Act, then, according to the ordinary rules of construction, if any cases have been decided as to the true construction of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, the same construction must be given to the same words in the Arbitration Act, 1889. The provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and of the Arbitration Act, 1889, as to referring back the awards of arbitrators, arose, as has been pointed out in the decided cases, in this way. There were submissions to arbitration which contained a provision that the award might be referred back to the arbitrator, and there were submissions which did not contain such a provision. If the submission did not give such power, the court could not refer an award back to the arbitrator; but if the submission did contain that power, then the court could refer back the award, but only upon certain grounds. The effect of the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and of the Arbitration Act, 1889, has been stated to be, and obviously is, that all submissions to arbitration, whether they are by agreement or are compulsory, are to be treated as if they contained a power to refer the award back to the arbitrator, and it is, therefore, necessary to construe the Arbitration Act in the same way as the old submission to arbitration which gave power to refer back the award. The decisions upon the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, were that the power of the court to refer back an award under that Act was only as large as that formerly given by a submission, and it was held that the effect of the Act was that it expressed the well-known law as to the decision of an arbitrator and umpire—that it was final and conclusive both as to matters of law and matters of fact, and that where there had been a mistake of law or of fact, the parties alone could not set up such a mistake as a ground for referring back the award. Formerly where there was a power to refer back, if one party alleged that a mistake of law or fact had been made, the courts construed the submission as providing that the parties had taken the arbitrator for better or for worse, and must submit to his mistakes; but if the arbitrator himself came forward, told the court that he had made a mistake of law or fact, and asked that his award might be referred back, then the court would not refer the award back. That law was continued under the Common

A Law Procedure Act. It seems to me that Dinn v. Blake (2) adopts that law, and it is said in that case (L.R. 10 C.P. at pp. 389, 390) that

"the exceptions are where there has been corruption or fraud, and where it appears on the face of the award that there has been a mistake of law or fact. . . . The latter case [Flynn v. Robertson (3)] was decided on the authority of Mills v. Bowyers' Society (4), in which case it was said that the court could refer back the award if the arbitrator himself stated that in his opinion he had made a mistake of law or fact and was desirous of the assistance of the court and willing to review his decision on the point on which he believed himself to have gone wrong. These cases have apparently established another exception in addition to those mentioned by WILLIAMS, J. But the exception depends on the admission of the arbitrator himself."

C Unless the arbitrator so states, the award will not be referred back to him. This rule of the court or of law applies, however, only to the allegation that there has been a mistake of law or fact, and Dinn v. Blake (2) applies only to such a case and is no authority beyond it.

D The present case is not a case in which it is alleged that the arbitrators made a mistake of law or fact upon the case as it was laid before them; it is a case in which it is alleged that the whole case and evidence was not laid before them, and that material evidence has been discovered since the award. The case before us now is one where evidence has been discovered since the arbitration proceedings, and we are not called upon to say whether there are other cases which may justify the court in sending back an award; e.g., where evidence has been purposely kept back. When other cases do arise the court will give their opinion upon them. Here the only question is, whether new evidence has been discovered since the award, and whether that is a good ground for referring the award back when the arbitrator himself does not come forward to ask that it may be referred back.

E On that point there is Burnard v. Wainwright (1), which was decided before the F Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, but on a submission which contained a power to refer back the award, and was, therefore, in the same position as are now all submissions to arbitration. In that case it was decided by WIGHTMAN, J., in express terms that, if evidence is discovered since the decision of the arbitrator, that is a ground upon which the court may send back the award for reconsideration by the arbitrator, even if there were no request by the arbitrator to do so.

G being held, then, in the case of a submission containing a power to refer the award back, we ought now to adopt the same rule in a case under the Arbitration Act, 1889. Has any new evidence been discovered in this case? It is said that we ought not to send this award back unless the alleged new evidence is such as would be admitted as evidence in a court of law. The parties, however, have agreed to take their dispute before umpires who are not bound by the rules of

H evidence which are observed in a court of law, and the court, therefore, ought not to bind the parties by its own rules of evidence, but ought only to consider whether something has been discovered since the award which an arbitrator might consider material. We cannot say whether this alleged evidence would be considered material by the arbitrator or not. If it is something relating to the matter in dispute, whether it is evidence according to the rules of a court of law or not, the

I court may send back the award to the arbitrator for reconsideration, though the court is not bound to do so. Here it seems to me that that which has been discovered does relate sufficiently to the matter in dispute to justify the court in sending back the award to the arbitrator for him to consider the matter, leaving the decision as to the effect of this alleged evidence to the arbitrator. The judges of the Divisional Court in the exercise of their discretion did think that they ought to send back this award to the arbitrators for reconsideration, and I agree with their view. The appeal fails and must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the decision of the Divisional Court was right, and must be affirmed. This case arises under s. 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and the words of that section are : A

“In all cases of reference to arbitration the court or a judge may from time to time remit the matters referred, or any of them, to the reconsideration of the arbitrators or umpire.” B

Those words are very large and general, but I am not prepared to say that they are larger or more comprehensive than the words of s. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 [repealed by Arbitration Act, 1889], which were :

“In any case where reference shall be made to arbitration as aforesaid, the court or a judge shall have power at any time and from time to time to remit the matters referred, or any or either of them, to the reconsideration and redetermination of the said arbitrator, upon such terms as to costs and otherwise as to the said court or judge may seem proper.” C

It appears to me, then, that all the cases decided upon s. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, are applicable to s. 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

It becomes material, therefore, to consider what was the law under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and before that Act. The first case which has been cited, a case of great importance, was Burnard v. Wainwright (1), which, in my opinion, governs the present matter. That case raised the same point as that which has been raised here, and the headnote to the report of that case is as follows (19 L.J.Q.B. 423) : D

“After an award made in favour of B. against W. on a submission to reference between them, which contained a clause empowering the court to remit the matters to the reconsideration of the arbitrators, W. moved to send back the award to the arbitrators, on the ground that since the award he had discovered a letter in the handwriting of B. which contained material evidence in his favour. The arbitrators deposed that, had such a letter in the handwriting of B. been produced at the reference, their decision would have been materially affected. B. in answer swore that the letter was not in his handwriting, but was an absolute forgery. The court remitted the case to the arbitrators for them to say if the letter were in B.’s handwriting, and if they found that it was, then for them to reconsider the matters in difference.” E

It is to be observed that the submission in that case contained a power to send back the award, and also that the arbitrators stated that their decision would have been materially affected by the new evidence. That case, therefore, is very similar to the present case, because it has been decided that under the Common Law Procedure Act the law upon this matter was the same as before that Act, and because there has been in this case a statement by the arbitrators in respect of the new evidence. The judgment of WIGHTMAN, J., was as follows (ibid. at pp. 424, 425) : F

“It seems to me that, according to a fair construction of the affidavits, this letter was a new piece of evidence, discovered after the award was made. I think it reasonable that the award should be sent back to the arbitrators for them to determine on the genuineness of this letter and its effect if genuine.” G

He did not seem to attach any importance to the statement made by the arbitrators that the new evidence would have materially affected their decision. It is material, however, to observe that there was not in that case any affidavit by the arbitrators asking the court to assist them, or any intimation from them to that effect. That case, therefore, is most material in the consideration of this case. H

Then followed a case, important to the consideration of this case, which decided that under s. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, it was no longer neces- I

A sary to insert in a submission a power to remit the award. That was Mills v. Bowyers' Society (4), in which Wood, V.-C., says (8 K. & J. at pp. 71, 72):

B "It appears to me that s. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, in no way authorises any such course of proceeding as that which I understood was endeavoured to be pressed on the court in the argument of this case. It does not appear that there is anything in that statute which would authorise the court to send back an award for the reconsideration of the arbitrators upon any other grounds than those which have hitherto prevailed to invalidate an award. . . . This s. 8 is nothing more or less, as it appears to me, looking back to the history of what took place before the passing of the Act, than the introduction of a statutory enactment enabling the court to do that which experience had shown it was convenient it should have the power of doing, and which had frequently before been specially provided in orders of reference by the court, and in submissions by consent between the parties, namely, that there should be a special power in the court to remit the matters in question, or any of them, to the consideration of arbitrators, rather than set the whole award aside."

D That decision makes it perfectly clear that, since the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, a submission without that clause has precisely the same effect as a submission containing that clause previously had.

In 1875 Dinn v. Blake (2) was decided, which is very material, because it was there pointed out precisely under what circumstances an award may be sent back to arbitrators. The headnote to that case is as follows (L.R. 10 C.P. 388):

E "An award will not be sent back to the arbitrator on the ground that he has made a mistake in the legal principle upon which his award is based, except where the arbitrator himself admits the mistake"; and ARCHIBALD, J., stated the law shortly and clearly, saying (ibid. at p. 391):

F "The general principle is that an award is final; and, assuming that it is good on the face of it, there can be no appeal from it. The only exceptions are where there is corruption on the part of the arbitrator, or excess of jurisdiction, or where the arbitrator himself admits that there is a mistake, and, as it were, craves the assistance of the court in setting it right."

The present case is quite distinct from Dinn v. Blake (2), and is governed by Burnard v. Wainwright (1). There is power to remit an award, not upon the ground of any mistake of law or fact, but upon the ground of the discovery of new evidence since the hearing by the arbitrators. It is clear to me that the court has jurisdiction to remit this award. It has been argued that this is not a case in which the court ought to exercise that power, but I think that it is a case in which the court may properly exercise such jurisdiction. I think that new evidence has been discovered in this case. It is said that it is not such evidence as would be received in a court of law, and that we ought not, therefore, to remit this award on the ground that this evidence has been discovered. That argument entirely fails; these are lay arbitrators who are not bound by legal rules of evidence. We must look at this matter as an arbitrator would, and, if this is evidence which he might receive, then it is evidence in respect of which the award should be sent back to him for reconsideration. I am not, indeed, prepared to say that this is not legal evidence, but I express no opinion upon that question. The conclusion to which I come is, that the court has jurisdiction to remit an award upon this ground, and that the alleged evidence which has been discovered since the hearing is such evidence as to justify the court, in the exercise of its discretion, in remitting the award for reconsideration. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—This appeal raises one question of great importance as to the remitting of awards for reconsideration. The question is whether s. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which has been, in effect, re-enacted by s. 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, gives the court any larger power to interfere with awards than it had before those Acts. I am strongly of opinion that neither Act intended to give any appeal from an arbitrator—that is, to give the court power to set aside an award simply because the court thought that the arbitrator was wrong. What, then, was the effect of the Act of 1854? It is difficult to say what is the limit of power of the court to remit an award. We cannot, however, do better than follow those decisions which show with what caution the courts acted in exercising the power to set aside an award. An award should be, generally speaking, final and conclusive, because the arbitrators have been chosen by the parties themselves to settle their disputes. I think that the cases have laid down with sufficient clearness the rules upon which the court should act in exercising the power to remit, to enable us to say that the facts of this case bring it within those rules.

From the judgment of ARCHIBALD, J., in Dinn v. Blake (2), a case decided since the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, it appears in what cases the power to remit an award should be exercised, and that such power should be exercised in narrow limits. There is one case, Burnard v. Wainwright (1), in which other circumstances were added to those in which an award will be remitted, namely, where after an award has been made new evidence has been discovered which might affect the decision of the arbitrators, and was not before them at the hearing. That, it was held, may be a ground for remitting an award, and certainly may be so if the arbitrators themselves say it might have affected their decision. A statement to that effect seems to have been made by the arbitrators in Burnard v. Wainwright (1), and something much the same has been said by the arbitrators in this case. I think, therefore, that this case is brought exactly within Burnard v. Wainwright (1). That case was decided before the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and in the submission in that case there was contained a power to remit the award to the arbitrators. That clause was not treated as giving the court an absolute discretion whether it would remit the award or not, but, in the exercise of that power, it was thought to be a proper case to remit because new evidence had been discovered after the award which the arbitrators might consider material. I think that the present case comes within that decision, and that we shall not be extending the jurisdiction of the court to remit awards by doing so in this case, because we are simply following a previous case. I am not prepared to go one step beyond those cases, and I think that s. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and s. 10 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, did not give any right of appeal from the decision of arbitrators.

It is not, I think, too much to say that Mills v. Bowyers' Society (4) decided that one object of s. 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, was to obviate the necessity of inserting in a submission a power to remit the award, and to give the court that power which it did not previously possess. Before the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, the court acted very cautiously in exercising the power to remit given by submissions. Perhaps the Act gave the court a little larger power, but very little, I think, than the clause formerly inserted in submissions. We should, in my opinion, hold that it would not be right to remit an award if it would not have been remitted by the court, previously to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, under a power to remit contained in a submission.

Another important point has been raised. It is said that the evidence here is of such a nature that a court of law would not receive it; that, according to the rules of evidence observed in the High Court, this evidence would not be admitted; and that, therefore, the court would go too far if it said that, upon the discovery of such evidence, it was right to remit the award for re-consideration. It is difficult to lay down any strict and definite rule upon this point. If something were alleged to have been discovered, which it might be grossly unjust to admit contrary to the legal rules of evidence, the court might refuse to remit. Here, however, I am not satisfied that this evidence would be inadmissible in the High Court, and, therefore, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that the subsequent discovery of this

A evidence is a good ground for sending back the award for re-consideration. I do not say that the court would not have jurisdiction to remit, even if the evidence were plainly not admissible in a court of law, but only that the court ought not to do so. That, however, is not the case here. For these reasons I am not prepared to disagree with the decision of the court below, and think that this appeal must be dismissed.

Constitutional Law—Foreign sovereign—Immunity from being sued—Voluntary submission to jurisdiction—Sojourn within jurisdiction as private individual under assumed name.

F

An action against an independent foreign sovereign prince cannot be maintained in an English court, for the court has no jurisdiction over him, unless he voluntarily submits himself in the face of the court to the jurisdiction when the court cites him to appear before it. It is not necessary for him to assert his right of immunity; the court is bound to take cognisance of it. The fact that at the time when the cause of action arose he was living in this country as a private individual under an assumed name does not constitute a submission to the jurisdiction.

A letter from a Secretary of State (which for this purpose is equivalent to a letter from Her Majesty the Queen herself) on the question whether or not an individual is an independent sovereign prince is decisive evidence in an English court of the facts stated in the document.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (WILLS and LAWRENCE, JJ.) setting aside an order for substituted service.

The writ was issued against "His Highness the Sultan of the State and Territory of Johore, otherwise known as Albert Baker," and was for damages for breach of promise of marriage, and for the return of a pair of diamond buckles or their value and damages for their detention. A master made an order for substituted service of this writ upon the defendant, and on appeal the learned judge referred the case to the court, the question being whether the defendant was subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of this country. In an affidavit filed by the plaintiff she stated that she was introduced to the defendant in August, 1885, as Mr. Albert Baker, and that she has known him ever since under that name, being the name under which he always passed; that he proposed and promised marriage with her in that year when she knew him as Mr. Albert Baker, and that he was known by that name in the neighbourhood in which he lived; that in October, 1885, she accidentally discovered his real name and position, but he made her promise never to reveal it or call him by any other name than the one she had previously known; that at the defendant's request she assumed the name of Mrs. Baker in her communications with him; that in October, 1885, the defendant took a furnished private house in London as and in the name of Mr. Albert Baker; that he afterwards left England for some years, but that upon his return in 1891 he again represented himself as Mr. Baker and as a private individual and subject to the Queen, and that on his visits to the plaintiff he always so represented himself.

To ascertain the position of the defendant, a communication was addressed by the learned judge at chambers to the Colonial Office, and in answer thereto a letter, dated Sept. 9, 1893, was received from an official in the Colonial Office on behalf of the Secretary of State, in which it was stated that

"Johore is an independent state and territory in the Malay Peninsula, and that his Highness Abubakar is the present Sovereign ruler thereof; that the relations between himself and Her Majesty the Queen, which are relations of alliance and not suzerainty, are now regulated by treaty, wherein he is called the Maharajah of Johore; that the Sultan has raised and maintains armed forces by sea and land, has organised a postal system, dispenses justice through regularly constituted courts of justice, and generally speaking exercises, without question, the usual attributes of a Sovereign ruler."

The Divisional Court set aside the order for substituted service and stayed the action, and the plaintiff appealed.

A LORD ESHER, M.R.—For the purposes of this case we must assume that the defendant, the Sultan of Johore, lived in this country under the name of Albert Baker, that he looked as if that might be his real name, and that the plaintiff believed that it was his real name. We must also assume that under this name he promised to marry the plaintiff, and that he broke his promise. On being sued for a breach of this promise, he says that he is a sovereign prince, and that, therefore, no civil action can be maintained against him in this country. An elaborate argument on this point has been presented to us, which was much the same as that which was put forward in The Parlement Belge (1). The House of Lords had formerly declined to determine the point. It was, however, argued and determined and all the authorities upon it inquired into with the utmost care in The Parlement Belge (1). That case was decided by the Court of Appeal, and the judgment in it would, therefore, be binding on us in deciding the present case, even if we did not altogether agree with it.

The first point argued was that there was no sufficient evidence that the defendant is an independent sovereign prince. The evidence is a letter written from the Colonial Office and signed by an official on behalf of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The Secretary of State is the adviser of the Queen, and upon such a matter as this a letter from the Colonial Secretary has the same effect in courts of justice as if the letter had been written by the Queen herself. It was argued that the court ought not to remain satisfied with the letter, but ought to make further inquiries, and reference was made to what was said by SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE in The Charkieh (2). I know what he said in that case, but the judgment of the court in The Parlement Belge (1) shows that his opinion was not right. I think that a certificate from the Queen, given through her responsible Minister upon the question of the position of a foreign sovereign with regard to herself, is decisive in her courts of law. It is, therefore, clear that the defendant is an independent sovereign. All independent sovereigns are, so far as this question is concerned, equal to one another.

That being the defendant's position, the question arises whether he can be sued in the courts of this country. It is suggested that in this case he can be sued, because, by coming to this country and living here under a false name and so deceiving the plaintiff, he has lost his privilege as an independent sovereign and made himself subject to the jurisdiction of the courts in this country. Now the whole of this subject was carefully considered in The Parlement Belge (1). It was then pointed out that great judges had formerly declined to give decisive opinions on the matter, but I think that in that case the court was called upon to decide the point and did decide it. In delivering the judgment of the court I used these words (5 P.D. at p. 206):

“The first question therefore is—what is the principle on which the exemption of the person of sovereigns and of certain public properties has been recognised? ‘Our king,’ says BLACKSTONE (bk. 1, c. 7),

H ‘owes no kind of subjection to any other potentate on earth. Hence it is that no suit or action can be brought against the king, even in civil matters, because no court can have jurisdiction over him. For all jurisdiction implies superiority of power; authority to try would be vain and idle without an authority to redress, and the sentence of a court would be contemptible unless the court had power to command the execution of it; but who shall command the king?’

I In this passage, which has been often cited and relied on, the reason of the exemption is the character of the sovereign authority, its high dignity, whereby it is not subject to any superior authority of any kind. ‘The word,’ says WHEATON, adopting the words of the judgment in the case of The Exchange (3),

‘being composed of distinct sovereignties, possessing equal rights and equal independence, all sovereigns have consented to a relaxation in practice, under certain peculiar circumstances, of that absolute and complete jurisdiction within their respective territories which sovereignty confers.' 'This perfect equality and absolute independence of sovereigns has given rise to a class of cases in which every sovereign is understood to waive the exercise of a part of that complete exclusive territorial jurisdiction which has been stated to be the attribute of every nation.' 'One of these is the exemption of the person of the sovereign from arrest or detention within a foreign territory. Why have the whole world concurred in this? The answer cannot be mistaken. A foreign sovereign is not understood as intending to subject himself to a jurisdiction incompatible with his dignity and the dignity of his nation.' "

Later, I used these words (5 P.D. at pp. 214, 215) :

"The principle to be deduced from all these cases is that, as a consequence of the absolute independence of every sovereign authority, and of the international comity which induces every sovereign State to respect the independence and dignity of every other sovereign State, each and every one declines to exercise by means of its courts any of its territorial jurisdiction over the person of any sovereign or ambassador of any other State, or over the public property of any State which is destined to public use, or over the property of any ambassador, though such sovereign, ambassador, or property be within its territory, and therefore, but for the common agreement, subject to its jurisdiction."

The Court of Appeal seems to me to have there laid down an absolute rule, without any exception or qualification whatever. No mention was made there of the case of a sovereign voluntarily submitting himself to the authority of a foreign court. Everyone knows that a sovereign can do so, if he wishes. What is the time when a sovereign must decide whether he submits or not? It must be when the court is about to exercise authority over him. He elects whether he will submit or not when the court cites him to appear, and if at that time he proves that he is an independent sovereign, then the court has no jurisdiction over him. The court cannot inquire into what he has previously been doing, and if he at that time elects not to submit to the jurisdiction of the court, then the court has no jurisdiction over him. The court cannot inquire whether he has been acting incognito or deceitfully, nor make any inquiries into the nature of his conduct. That seems to me to be the law as laid down in The Parlement Belge (1), which is a decision binding upon this court. I think that this appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—It was contended that the defendant's position as an independent sovereign prince was not satisfactorily established. It seems to me to have been fully established that the defendant is as much an independent sovereign prince as any in Europe, and like all independent sovereign princes he is entitled, upon coming into this country, to immunity from the jurisdiction of English courts. That such is the law seems to me to have been clearly established in The Parlement Belge (1). VATTEL, too, in a passage that was cited in the judgment in The Parlement Belge (1) (5 P.D. at pp. 206, 207), says (bk. 4, c. 7, s. 108) that a sovereign prince who may come as a traveller into a foreign country is exempted from all jurisdiction. There is no doubt that a foreign sovereign may submit, if he chooses to do so, to the jurisdiction of the courts of this country. It is argued that the defendant has done so in this case, because he has lived and acted in this country as a private individual and under an assumed name. We are, therefore, asked to infer that he has submitted to the jurisdiction of the courts of this country. I am clearly of opinion that we cannot draw any such inference. The only mode in which a foreign sovereign can submit to the jurisdiction of our courts is by a submission in the face of the court. He does not waive his rights by taking an assumed name or doing anything of that kind. VATTEL again says that a sovereign, on making himself known, cannot be treated as subject to the common laws, for it

A is not to be presumed that he has consented to such a subjection. It is clear, to my mind, that there has been no submission by the defendant to the jurisdiction of English courts, and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—The status of a foreign sovereign is one of which the courts will take judicial cognisance; that is to say, neither party to the action is required to prove to the court whether or not a person is in the position of an independent sovereign. If there is any doubt upon the matter the court will take means to inform itself. Here the defendant is the Sultan of Johore, and the means which WRIGHT, J., took to inform himself was an inquiry at the Colonial Office. A letter was sent to him from that office signed by an official, who stated that he was directed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies to give the information which the letter contained. For the plaintiff it was argued that that was not enough. I confess that I cannot conceive a more satisfactory mode of obtaining information of this kind than a letter from one of the Queen's Secretaries of State, which, for this purpose, is entirely the same as a letter from the Queen herself, and if Her Majesty condescends to state to one of her own courts that a certain person is an independent sovereign, such a statement must be conclusive. That this letter contains such a statement seems to me to be perfectly clear. A treaty is referred to in it, under which the Sultan is entitled to British protection, and by which he undertakes not to enter into any negotiations or treaty with any foreign State without the consent of Her Majesty. From this it was argued that he had ceased to be an independent sovereign; but clearly he is not dependent on anyone. The Queen has given him her protection as a condition of his not entering into relations with foreign countries, and if he should do so, contrary to his agreement, he would lose his right of protection, and possibly other consequences might follow. But there seems to me to be nothing in this treaty to disprove or to qualify the statement contained in the letter that the Sultan of Johore is an independent sovereign.

The next point in the argument was this: An independent sovereign, who is sued in a foreign court, may waive his rights of immunity and become subject to the jurisdiction of the court. I agree that that is so; but how is it to be done? Supposing some great European potentate were to be sued in an English court, but were to take no notice of the proceedings, then the court would take judicial notice of the fact that he was a foreign sovereign, and, therefore, not subject to English jurisdiction. This shows that it is not necessary for a foreign sovereign to assert his rights of immunity, but that the court is bound to take notice of the fact, and to say that it has no jurisdiction. It was said that the defendant in this case had waived his rights. It is said that he came to England as a private person, passed under the name of Albert Baker, as such entered into the relations with the plaintiff upon which this action is founded, and that by doing this he showed that he intended and wished to be treated in this country as a private individual, and therefore as subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of this country in the same way as any other private individual would be. The question arises, whether a foreign sovereign who has lived in this country perfectly incognito, no one knowing that he is an independent sovereign, thereby waives his rights of immunity as an independent sovereign. The only authority cited in support of that is a dictum of LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., reported in Wadsworth v. Queen of Spain (4) (20 L.J.Q.B. at p. 492). The case is also reported in the LAW REPORTS, but the dictum relied on appears nowhere but in the LAW JOURNAL report. Under these circumstances the dictum seems to me not to be one of very great authority. Probably when the LAW REPORTS report came, as it may have done, to LORD CAMPBELL for revision, he would not allow it to remain in the report. Besides that dictum certain textbooks were cited; but in the books by writers of great authority, such as VATTEL, nothing of the kind appears. On the contrary, there are the passages from VATTEL which LOPES, L.J., has referred to, which show that the moment at which a defendant should claim immunity as a foreign sovereign is the moment when he is cited to appear before the court. The true proposition of law seems to me to be that a foreign sovereign is entitled to immunity from an action brought in the courts of this country, unless in any particular action he chooses to waive his immunity and submit to the jurisdiction of the court. Here the defendant has not consented to submit to the court; but has acted just to the contrary. Having done nothing to waive the immunity which he now claims, I think that, upon principles which are well settled upon abundant authority, he is entitled to immunity, and that this appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Master and Servant—Wages—Truck Acts—Agreement respecting person to whom part of wages to be paid—Agreement by employee to subscribe to sick and accident club—Payment of subscriptions by employer out of wages—Truck Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37), s. 2.

A payment made by an employer at the instance of a person employed by him to discharge some obligation of the person employed, or to place the money in the hands of a third person in whose hands the person employed desires it to be placed, is, in the sense and meaning of ss. 3 and 4 of the Truck Act, 1831, a payment to the person employed as much as if the current coin of the realm had been placed in his hands and he had made the payment to the third person himself.

The appellant, an employee of the respondent, as a condition of her employment signed an agreement with the respondent by which she undertook to become a member of a sick and accident club and to subscribe a weekly sum of the funds in proportion to her wages. Those sums were deducted weekly from her wages and paid to the treasurer of the club.

Held: assuming, but not deciding, that the agreement fell within s. 2 of the Truck Act, 1831, the payments made by the respondent on behalf of the appellant were equivalent to payments made by the respondent to the appellant herself in current coin within the meaning of the Act.

Notes. The Payment of Wages Act, 1960 [40 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 290], relaxes the provisions of the Truck Acts and provides that, if employer and employee so agree, the employee's wages may be paid into a bank, or by postal order, money order, or cheque.

C Their Lordships took time for consideration.

May 7, 1894. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The facts of this case are very simple, and may be shortly stated, but the point raised is one by no means free from difficulty.

D The appellant, who was plaintiff in the action below, entered several times into the service of the defendants, who are the respondents at the Bar, first in the year 1886, again in the year 1888, and again in the year 1890. On each occasion the appellant entered into an agreement with her employers, which was signed by her,

"to conform to all the rules and regulations of Messrs F. Allen and Son's works, and to submit to the penalties for breach of the same, a copy of which rules and regulations was given me at the time of signing this."

E One of the rules to which she so agreed to conform was in these words: "All employees will have to become members of the Sick and Accident Clubs." It appears that there was a sick and benefit society established in connection with the employment for the benefit of employees at Messrs. Allen & Son's works. The rules of that society provided that the contributors to the fund were to "consist of F all employed in the works who" were to be divided into five classes, and according to the class was the amount of weekly subscription, varying from 5d. down to 1½d., and also the amount of "weekly relief in case of sickness or accident," varying from 12s. down to 3s., and "death money" varying from eight guineas down to two guineas. The subscription was to "include doctor's attendance free within three miles, unless members" were "able to call at his surgery." By another rule

G "a member of the firm" was "to act as treasurer, and the club" was to "have its own committee of management of twenty members," who were to "conduct all the business of the club, their services rendered being gratuitous." In accordance with these rules it was the practice for a weekly payment to be made to the treasurer of the fund, and the sums received by him were paid from time to time to a separate account which was kept at the bank, and in case of sickness or the other cases referred to, the members received relief from the fund so established. H There was deducted from the plaintiff's wages (in the manner which I will refer to in a moment) weekly the sum of, at one time 2½d., and at another 3d. a week; that is to say, the subscriptions of the fourth class and the third class.

I It appears that each week the appellant received a ticket, of which one was produced to your Lordships, showing the gross amount of wages due, and there was in this particular case 15s. 9d., from which was deducted, "fines 2d., sick club 2½d."; so that each week at the time when the appellant received the balance she was made aware that there was being paid by the firm to the treasurer of the sick club this amount of 2½d. or 3d., as the case might be, and that payment was made without objection during the whole time that she was in the employ of the respondents. When she left she received the sum of 3s. from the fund, which it appears was the amount to which any member was entitled on ceasing to be in the employ of the employers. Of course, during the whole time she was in their employment she received the advantages of being a member of this sick and benefit club. It was suggested on behalf of the appellant that she had received nothing from the fund except the 3s. on leaving it, that that was the only benefit she had derived. I cannot at all concur in that view. Although she in point of fact did not fall ill during the time that she was in their employ, she received the benefit of having secured to her, in case she fell ill, a considerable weekly payment out of the sick fund.

After her employment ceased the present action was brought, and she claimed a right to recover, less certain deductions with which I need not trouble your Lordships, the total amount that had been in this way weekly paid to the sick club, and, in the manner that I have described, deducted from the sum which she otherwise would have received from the employers. If it had not been for the provisions of the Truck Act, I do not think it can be doubted for a moment that the plaintiff would have had no possible claim. The fact that she had become a member of this sick club, and that week by week to her knowledge and with her assent a sum had been paid by the employers on her behalf to the sick fund, which gave her a right to all its advantages would be a complete answer to any such action. I do not think that was really disputed at the Bar, but the plaintiff's case rested entirely upon the provisions of the Truck Act, 1831. It was alleged that she had not received the whole of her wages in the manner in which that Act entitled her to demand them, and that, she not having received the whole of her wages, the balance now fell to be paid by her employers. I should state that, during a portion of the time when she was first in the service of the employers, the character of the employment was not one within the Truck Act, 1831. It only came within the Truck Acts by reason of the amending Act, the Truck Amendment Act, 1887, which brought that particular occupation within it.

The Act of 1831 is intituled, "An Act to prohibit the payment, in certain trades, of wages in goods, or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm." By s. 3:

"The entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer . . . in respect of any labour by him done . . . shall be actually paid to such artificer in the current coin of this realm, and not otherwise; and every payment made to any such artificer by his employer, of or in respect of any such wages, by the delivering to him of goods or otherwise than in the current coin aforesaid, except as hereinafter mentioned, shall be and is hereby declared illegal, null, and void."

By s. 4:

"Every artificer . . . shall be entitled to recover from his employer . . . in the manner by law provided for the recovery of servants' wages, or by any other lawful ways and means, the whole or so much of the wages earned by such artificer . . . as shall not have been actually paid to him by such his employer in the current coin of this realm."

It is on those two sections that in the first place the plaintiff founds her action. She alleges that she has not been paid in the current coin of the realm the wages to which she was entitled. I do not think it can be doubted that the object of this enactment was to strike at the practice which had grown up of employers making their payment in part by the supply of goods in the sale of which they were interested—a practice which it was thought would place the person employed at an unfair disadvantage, and one which it was thought was calculated to result in the person employed obtaining something less than the agreed remuneration for services.

The contrast in those sections is between payment in current coin of the realm and payment in some other fashion, and I can myself entertain no doubt that a payment made by an employer at the instance of a person employed to discharge some obligation of the person employed, or to place the money in the hands of some person in whose hands the person employed desires it to be placed, is in the sense and meaning of those sections a payment to the person employed as much as

A if the current coin of the realm had been placed in his or her hands. It is said that money paid in that way would not be a payment of the debt—that it could not have been pleaded as payment; that the defence must have been one of set-off. Whether that be so or not, in accordance with the system of pleading which previously prevailed, I do not think it at all necessary to inquire. The distinction between payment and set-off was often a very fine one in the old days. But, however that may be, as a matter of pleading, I cannot myself doubt that, looking at the purpose and object as well as the words of this statute, a payment made in that fashion would be a payment in the current coin of the realm, and not otherwise, within the meaning of the Truck Act. The case obviously would not be in the slightest degree within the mischief against which that statute was directed.

C I ought also to call attention to the fact that s. 5 of the statute does prohibit set-off in particular cases. The employer in any action commenced by an artificer for the recovery of wages is not to be allowed a set-off,

“nor to claim any reduction of the plaintiff's demand by reason . . . of any goods, wares, or merchandise had or received by the plaintiff as or on account of his wages . . . or by reason or in respect of any goods, wares, or merchandise sold, delivered, or supplied to such artificer at any shop or warehouse kept by or belonging to such employer, or in the profits of which such employer shall have any share or interest.”

The object of that enactment is obvious, but it does not touch a case of set-off (if it be a case of set-off) of money paid for the person employed at his or her request. But then it is said that s. 2 of the statute enacts:

E “If, in any contract hereafter to be made between any artificer . . . and his employer, any provision shall be made directly or indirectly respecting the place where, or the manner in which, or the person or persons with whom, the whole or any part of the wages due or to become due to any such artificer shall be laid out or expended, such contract shall be and is hereby declared illegal, null, and void.”

F The words relied on in that section by the appellant are these, that any provision made directly or indirectly respecting the manner in which, or the person with whom, any of the moneys to become due shall be laid out or expended is rendered illegal, null, and void. The contention on behalf of the appellant is this. The appellant, by a provision in the contract between her and her employers agreed to become a member of the sick and accident club; although the agreement did not in terms provide that the subscriptions to that club were to be paid out of her wages, yet, nevertheless, that must have been in the contemplation of the parties; and, therefore, the stipulation in the agreement was illegal within the Truck Act, and null and void, because it was an agreement as to the mode in which week by week a portion of her wages was to be expended.

G
H The question raised by that contention is certainly one of very considerable importance, and also one of very considerable difficulty. Various cases were put at the Bar, in which it would be strange to suppose the legislature had prohibited the agreements suggested; as, for example, if the agreement contained a provision that the person employed should enter into a fidelity insurance contract, and keep up that policy so as to make a provision against any default on his or her part towards the employers. Such a provision for the protection of the employers, it was said,

I would be not in the slightest degree within the mischief against which the Truck Act was directed; it would be a reasonable and proper agreement to come to, and it cannot be supposed that the legislature intended to prohibit it by the general words which have been used in s. 2 of the Truck Act. Here, it was said, in the agreement in this case nothing was stipulated with regard to payment out of the wages, or that the subscription was to be kept up by payment from the wages. It was merely a general contract that she would join this sick fund, no doubt implying that she would make the payments which were requisite to secure such membership. There is, no doubt, very great force in that argument; but, on the other hand, it would be, I think, very dangerous to hold that any contract made by a person employed which involved expenditure of money from time to time was not within the section merely because it did not provide that the money should be paid out of wages. So to hold would be, in some cases, undoubtedly to enable the purpose and object of s. 2 to be evaded.

I find it very difficult indeed to say where the line should be drawn, if a line is to be drawn, between cases such as these, which would be the one class within and the other without the scope and intention of the Truck Act. It may be that it is impossible to draw any such line, and that each case must be dealt with upon a consideration of its own circumstances, and a determination whether it is, or is not, within s. 2. In the present case it does not seem to me to be necessary to determine this question. For the purpose of my decision I will assume that the case is within s. 2 of the Truck Act, though I must not be understood as in any way indicating an opinion that it is so. But, assuming it to be within s. 2, what is the effect of that section? It makes that provision illegal, null, and void. As regards its illegality, of course, if it be within the section, it would render the employer liable to the penalty provided by the Truck Act. But, in addition to that, it is made null and void.

It is to be observed that the becoming a member of this sick and accident club is certainly not made illegal or null and void. It is the contract to become so and to pay the subscriptions which alone can be said to be made null and void; that is to say, that the employer, it being null and void, could not as against the employee, enforce that provision. That, and nothing more than that, seems to me to be the result of the application of s. 2, supposing it to apply to such a case as the present—that the employed might at any time have said: "I will not join," or "I will not continue a member of the sick club," and by so saying would not have committed any breach of contract as against the employers, because the contract was null and void. But supposing, in that sense (and that seems to me the only sense in which the section could be operative), the contract to become a member was null and void, the question which has to be considered in the present case is what is the position of the employed as regards the employers, supposing that, with her assent, the employers have made a payment week by week on her behalf to the treasurer of a society to which she has consented to belong, and has belonged, during the time she was in their service. I can find nothing in the Truck Act, under such circumstances, to prevent the employer, when sued, relying on the fact of such payments as the discharge of his obligations towards his employee in respect of such sums of money as he has not personally handed over to her. I will not repeat again the observations I have made about the only set-off or reduction of demand which is prohibited by the Act.

The question, then, is whether in the present case it is established that the total wages of the plaintiff have been paid, either by handing them to her in the current coin of the realm or by making, on her behalf, payments which she has authorised. I cannot doubt that, on the true view of the circumstances of this case, it has been established that the employer has thus discharged himself, and, unless there are provisions in the Truck Act which prevent the inferences being drawn, which otherwise would be drawn, the conclusion is absolutely irresistible.

I find that, in Re Morris, Ex parte Cooper (1), circumstances which were very similar to the present were considered by the Court of Appeal. In that case deductions were made from the wages when payment was made to the person employed, and on the back of the ticket which was given to each workman when he received his wages were printed some terms and regulations, among which were regulations as to the payment to the doctor's fund of so much a month according to the wages which he received, and payments to the reading-room fund of "4d. per month, payable by all men and boys over sixteen years of age. These payments will be deducted from the wages." That had gone on for a considerable time, and deductions to a substantial amount had been made in that way from the wages for the purpose of being paid to the treasurer of the reading-room fund and to the

A doctor, but the firm in fact had not paid either the doctor or the treasurer of the reading-room fund. Under those circumstances steps were taken by the persons employed to recover the money which had been so deducted from their wages. Of course, that case differed from the present inasmuch as there remained in the hands of the firm the moneys which they had deducted, and the defence suggested in the present case did not arise there. The court so held, but LORD SELBORNE, B L.C., in delivering judgment, said (26 Ch.D. at p. 698):

C "It was suggested that certain sums were payable by the workmen under contracts, which were in substance their contracts, to the doctor and for the purposes of the reading-room, and that by arrangement with the employers those sums were to be paid out of that part of the wages which had not been paid to the men. If that had been actually done and a settlement upon that footing had taken place, I am not, as at present advised, prepared to say that such a settlement could have been treated as a nullity by reason of the Truck Act."

D That is an expression of opinion on the very point now under consideration; because I can see not the slightest distinction between a payment to the treasurer of that reading-room fund and a payment to the treasurer of this sick and accident club. COTTON, L.J., in that case, said (ibid. at p. 699):

E "We do not in any way encourage the idea that our decision would apply (I desire to guard myself in this way, and I understand that the Lord Chancellor intended to do so) to any deduction made from the wages, and in fact applied by the employers by the direction of the workmen, or in pursuance of an arrangement made with them, in discharge of a debt for which they were liable."

F Therefore, we have a very distinct expression of opinion by those eminent judges. LORD SELBORNE and COTTON, L.J., in favour of the view which in substance has been taken by the court below, and which I am prepared to recommend your Lordships to adopt. For these reasons I move that the judgment appealed from be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

G LORD WATSON.—In my opinion, the stipulation in her contract of employment that she should become a member of the sick and accident club, when taken by itself, imposed a perfectly lawful condition upon the appellant. I am also of opinion that the course of dealing, by which the respondent firm paid her contributions to the club, and deducted the amount at the weekly settlement of her wages, had all along the tacit assent of the appellant, and that the case must be disposed of on the same footing as if each contribution had been advanced by them under express authority from the appellant. H After the exhaustive observations which have been made by my noble and learned friend, I need not recapitulate the sections of the Truck Act, 1831, which bear upon the question before us, or criticise their enactments in detail. For the reasons which the Lord Chancellor has assigned, I think that, while the case is one of nicety, your Lordships ought to accept the opinions expressed by the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., and COTTON, L.J., in Re Morris, Ex parte Cooper (1), and to hold that the contributions advanced by the respondent firm, on behalf of the appellant, were substantially equivalent to payments made by them to the appellant herself, in current coin, within the meaning of the Act. I am personally inclined to hold that the inference thus derived from the earlier sections of the Act is supported by the terms of s. 24, which (inter alia) enacts:

"Nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to prevent any employer from advancing to any such artificer any money to be by him contributed to any friendly society or bank for savings duly established according to law. . . ."

Apart from the statute, advancing the artificer's contributions to a friendly society, A established according to law, and advancing his contributions to a domestic club, having the same objects in view, appear to me to stand in pari passu. If s. 24 had been expressed in terms which clearly established an exception from preceding sections, it would, in my opinion, have afforded an argument in favour of the appellant, because such an exception would have indicated an intention of the legislature that advances of that kind were within the intendment of the Act, B and were not to be permitted unless in cases specially referred to. But, on consideration, I am of opinion that the section does not create a proper exception, and that it must be taken as indicating that the previous enactments were not intended to include and prohibit advances identical in principle with those mentioned. I, therefore, concur in the judgment proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD MORRIS.—I entirely concur in the opinion which has been so fully expressed by the Lord Chancellor; but, having a strong opinion on s. 2 of the Truck Act as affecting the present case, I consider that I am bound to state it. In my opinion, the contract in question is not one which is either aimed at or struck by s. 2 of the Truck Act. If we look at the contract itself as contained in the written document, it is merely to the effect that all employees shall become members of the sick and accident club. There is nothing in the contract, so far as the writing is concerned, that is at all within the purview of the Truck Act. But then, it is said that we must, upon the facts of the case, come to the conclusion that there was some understanding or agreement that a portion of the wages of an employee was to be deducted and paid to this benefit society, and that consequently that contract becomes illegal under s. 2. D

I cannot come to the conclusion in the first place that it is a portion of the contract. But, even if it was, it does not appear to me to be a matter aimed at by s. 2, which was passed entirely, as the preamble of the Act states, and as is stated in its title, in order to get rid of the payment of wages by goods. The words are that E

"If . . . any provision shall be made directly or indirectly respecting the place where, or the manner in which, or the person or persons with whom, the whole or any part of the wages due or to become due to any such artificer shall be laid out or expended, such contract shall be and is hereby declared illegal, null, and void."

In my opinion, the contract in question, even if there was this understanding, G certainly does not come within the spirit of the Act; in my opinion it does not come within the letter of the section, as a payment made to the benefit society was not a laying out or expending of the wages of the artificer within the meaning of s. 2, but was merely an allocation of part of the wages of the employee at the request of the employee, and, therefore, in my opinion, it does not come within the section. H

LORD SHAND.—I confess that it is satisfactory to me that your Lordships have come to the conclusion that this appeal should not be allowed, for I have felt throughout the argument that, whether it might or might not be possible to bring the case within the letter of the provisions of the Truck Act, it was not substantially within the mischief which that Act was intended to remedy, or within the spirit of the statute as striking against the evil which had been in existence at the time when it was passed. The grounds upon which your Lordships have proceeded, in which I entirely concur, are materially different from those which are the basis of the judgment of the learned judges of the Court of Appeal. Those learned judges have held expressly that the contract in this case was struck at by the provisions of the statute. Upon that question I shall only say that, while I shall not express myself so strongly as LORD MORRIS, I am certainly not satisfied that the contract in this case is one in violation of the provisions of the statute. If I

A one looks at these various provisions it appears plainly enough that the mischief to be remedied was, as has been already mentioned by the Lord Chancellor, that goods were given instead of or in part payment of wages to the persons employed, and that the employers, besides getting a benefit from the proper work done by their servants, were obtaining a second benefit by the supply of goods in the sale of which they were presumably interested; there was a double benefit to them.

B You see from the provisions of the statute that the two things which are strongly brought out in many of its various provisions and in the schedules attached to the Act, and which it was intended to prohibit, are payment in goods and an advantage thereby gained by the employers. In the present case neither of those elements is present. The contract has nothing to do with goods, and it cannot be suggested, indeed it has not been suggested in the argument, that the employer was to obtain any benefit whatever. But further than this, I participate in the view expressed by LORD MORRIS that it is an important circumstance here that there was no stipulation for the payment to be made out of wages at all. Apart from the acts of the parties, I find nothing in the contract which can be said to be struck at by the statute. I think an employer may fairly say: "I shall not employ or retain a servant in my employment unless he contributes to a sick and benefit fund, and thus makes a provision for a time of illness from accident or otherwise, or it may be death." As an employer he may say that he requires security from certain classes of servants, and will not employ those unless they contribute to one of the fidelity associations, or that he will only employ persons who belong and contribute to some temperance society, or something of that kind. There can be no doubt that the contract would have been fully implemented if the appellant, having obtained her wages week after week, had herself gone and contributed, out of the moneys which she had received, or other moneys, to the payment of any premium she required to pay, or the payments might have been made for her by other persons altogether. In short, so far as the contract itself is concerned, I do not read into it that it was necessary that the payments should be made out of her wages, nor should be deducted from each term's wages, which

F is essential to make the statute apply.

I certainly feel the difficulty which the Lord Chancellor has expressed in saying that, if there had been a provision that goods should be purchased at a particular store, it might perhaps be successfully contended that this would have been struck at by the Act, although it were not expressly stipulated that payment was to be made out of wages. I do not say how that might be, but the element that there

G is no personal advantage gained, or which might be presumed to be gained, by the employer (in a case like this) would weigh very much with me in considering whether upon the construction of such a contract it was struck at by the Act at all. Having expressed these views, differing from what has been indicated as the basis of the judgment in the court below, I entirely agree on the particular ground on which the Lord Chancellor has put the judgment which he has proposed in this

H case. I mean that there is clear evidence, or at all events evidence sufficient, to show that there was such an authority given by this appellant, week by week, for the payment of a contribution towards this sick and benefit fund as precludes her from now challenging those payments. The payment was made to the treasurer acting for this association, and I think that a payment made, presumably as when wages have become due, at the request or on the mandate of one of the persons

I employed, to meet an obligation or for a purpose which he or she desires to fulfil, is a payment which is not invalid as being struck at by the requirements of the statute. Upon these grounds I concur with your Lordships in thinking that this appeal should be dismissed.

Company—Director—Trustee of company's money of which he has control—Breach of trust—Ultra vires dealing with company's funds.

Directors are express trustees, or trustees by implication of law, of the moneys of the company of which they have control, and as such are entitled to the limitation of actions against trustees in respect of trust property prescribed by s. 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888 (now s. 19 of the Limitation Act, 1939), subject to the exceptions contained in that section. Directors of trading companies are not for all purposes trustees, or in the position of trustees, or quasi-trustees, but if they deal with the funds of the company which are under their control in a manner which is beyond their powers, as to that dealing they are treated as having committed a breach of trust.

Company—Director—Liability for false statement made by co-director—Statement made at shareholders' meeting—Need to prove thorough apprehension of falseness of statement and concurrence therewith.

Per KAY, L.J.: To render directors of a company liable for a false statement made by one of their number at a meeting of shareholders it must be proved very clearly that they thoroughly apprehended the falseness of the statement that was made and concurred in it for the purpose of deceiving the shareholders. The mere fact that they were present when the false statement was made is not enough to enable the court to treat them as having committed a fraud for the purpose of concealing the true facts from the shareholders.

E Appeal by the Official Receiver from a decision of WRIGHT, J., on two summonses taken out by the official receiver and liquidator, under s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, with the view, by the first summons, of making the respondents, S. Rowles Pattison, the Rev. Dawson Burns, George Dibley, and Morrell Theobald, who had been directors of the company, jointly and severally liable to make good to the assets of the company the sum of £35,000, alleged to have been improperly employed by them out of the moneys of the company in the purchase of 7,000 shares of £5 each in the Building Securities Co., Ltd., and, by the second summons having Edward Barnard, Joseph William Dresser, George Edward Brock, and Morrell Theobald declared jointly and severally liable for £5,200 invested in the purchase of 1,040 other shares in the Building Securities Co., Ltd.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an application under s. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, which has replaced a previous section of the Companies Act, 1862 [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 333]. Section 10 enacts:

I "Where in the course of the winding-up of a company under the Companies Acts it appears that any person who has taken part in the formation or promotion of the company, or any past or present director, manager, liquidator, or other officer of the company, has misapplied or retained or become liable or accountable for any moneys or property of the company, or been guilty of any misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company, the court may, on the application of the official receiver or of the liquidator of the company . . . examine into the conduct of such promoter, director, manager, liquidator, or other officer of the company, and compel him to repay any moneys or restore any property so misapplied or retained, or for which he has become liable or accountable together with interest." A

Under that section two summonses were taken out in 1893 against former directors of the Lands Allotment Co., which is now being wound-up. The object of the first summons is to compel certain of the directors to refund or make good the sum of £35,000. The object of the second summons is to compel two of the directors—namely, Mr. Brock and Mr. Theobald—to make good a sum of £5,200. B

As to the £35,000, the case stands thus. It appears that in the year 1885 a Mr. Hobbs was indebted to this company to the extent of £35,000. It appears that a company, called the Building Securities Co., was formed to take over Hobbs's business—to take over his assets and his liabilities—and under the arrangements made in the formation or after the formation of the Building Securities Co. it became their duty, as between them and Hobbs, to pay off that £35,000 which he owed to the Lands Allotment Co., and they proceeded to do that in this way. They had not, as I infer from the form taken by the transaction, got £35,000 with which to pay off Hobbs's debt. Therefore, the Building Securities Co. said to the Lands Allotment Co.: "If you will buy £35,000 of our shares and send us a cheque for that sum, you shall have the cheque back, and so we will repay you Hobbs's debt." That device was carried out. What is the effect of that? In point of fact no money passed out of the coffers of the Lands Allotment Co. into the coffers of the Building Securities Co. It was a mere paper transaction so far as cash was concerned. It is true that cheques were handed into the bank one day and the money taken out the next. But the net result and the real substance of that transaction, when you see through the cloak thrown around it, is that the Lands Allotment Co. took £35,000 worth of shares in the Building Securities Co. in satisfaction of Hobbs's debt. That is the real truth. C D E

It is said that that is a transaction which is ultra vires the directors of the Lands Allotment Co. I doubt, if you look at it, as I am disposed to do, as a matter of substance, whether it is ultra vires. I have not the slightest intention of throwing any doubt whatever upon its being ultra vires if the effect of it was to invest money of the Lands Allotment Co. in the purchase of shares in the Building Securities Co. I have not the slightest doubt that then it would be ultra vires, notwithstanding the ingenious argument we have heard upon the memorandum of association of the Lands Allotment Co. But in substance I doubt whether it was not within the powers of the directors to take fully paid-up shares of any company in satisfaction of a debt which they could not get paid. At all events, I shall pass that over, and for the rest of my observations I shall assume that the learned judge in the court below was right in holding it to be an ultra vires transaction. If it was an improper transaction, all those directors who were parties to this improper investment would obviously be liable to make good these moneys. All that is conceded if the assumption is granted. Then comes the question whether they are protected by the Statute of Limitations which is applicable to trustees. The learned judge in the court below has held that they are, and I confess that it appears to me that he is obviously right in the construction which he puts upon the Trustee Act, 1888. Consider what we are asked to do here. We are asked to put ourselves in a most grotesque position. We are asked to say that the directors are liable for these moneys upon the footing that they committed a breach of trust, but that they are not entitled to the benefit which comes into operation through a statute which was passed for the benefit of trustees. F G H I

I cannot be party to any decision so supremely absurd. It appears to me, I confess, when you have to apply the Trustee Act, 1888, to directors, you must bear in mind that, though directors are not trustees—if you talk of them generally, it would be a mistake to say that they are—yet they have always been considered and treated as trustees of moneys which come to their hands or are actually under their control. They have, ever since companies were invented, been held liable to make good moneys which they have misapplied upon the footing that they were trustees,

A and prior to the passing of the Trustees Act, 1888, it had always been held that directors were not entitled to the benefit of the Statute of Limitations when they had committed breaches of trust, and were, as regarded such moneys and in respect of such moneys, to be treated as trustees. When the legislature has passed an Act of Parliament protecting trustees against actions for breaches of trust—viz., the Trustee Act, 1888—how can it be with any sense said that they are not to have the benefit of that statute? I cannot go that length. I am satisfied that that statute does apply.

B Let us look at the words of s. 1 (3) of the Trustee Act, 1888 [see now Trustee Act, 1925, s. 68 (17)]. It says:

C "For the purposes of this Act the expression 'trustee' shall be deemed to include an executor or administrator and a trustee whose trust arises by construction or implication of law as well as an express trustee, but not the official trustee of charitable funds."

D Directors are express trustees of moneys of which they have control [see 6 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 299]. But if not, certainly they come within the other part of the definition of trustees "whose trust arises by construction or implication of law." It is precisely because they are one or the other that formerly they were always held liable, and were always denied the benefit of the Statute of Limitations. That being the case, I have no hesitation in saying that these directors are within the Trustee Act, 1888—always subject to some observations I must make about the alleged concealed fraud. I have no doubt the statute applies to them, and applies to all directors who have got in their hands or under their control money of a company, and who by mistake or carelessness misapply it. Of course we knew that there are words in s. 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888 [see now Limitation Act, 1939, s. 19], which render the Statute of Limitations inapplicable to the cases there mentioned, which are, substantially, cases of misappropriation of money to the use of the persons misapplying it, and also to cases of fraud.

E Although so far I have no doubt whatever that the Trustee Act, 1888, is applicable, yet a point is raised which is important. It is said that this is one of those cases of concealed fraud in which the Statute of Limitations does not come into operation—that is to say, that the cause of action did not accrue until the fraud was discovered. The misapplication in this case was not fraudulent in any sense. I am quite satisfied from the affidavits of the directors that they thought that it was a very good transaction. They made a mistake in their powers. There is no doubt at all about that, assuming, as I do now, that this was an ultra vires transaction. But the case of concealed fraud is attempted to be made out in this way. It is contended that at a meeting when this matter was referred to, the £35,000 was entered in the first balance-sheet and subsequent balance-sheets as an asset under the words which I will read. It is on the credit side: "Assets—By Building Securities Co. £35,000." That by itself, to my mind, may mean anything. It is, of course, clear that it means an asset. It may mean land owned by the Building Securities Co. It may mean that it is an investment in that company. That entry in the balance-sheet is quite consistent with either view. But we have it proved—subject to a remark which I will make presently—that on April 18, 1885, not long after this transaction had taken place, and after the balance-sheet to which I have referred had been circulated among the shareholders, Mr. Balfour [a director of the company] stated at the annual general meeting of the Lands Allotment Co. that the £35,000 was an asset representing an amount which was to be paid by the Building Securities Co. in respect of an "estate" which that company had purchased from the Lands Allotment Co.

I Whether the real word used there was "estate," as the shorthand-writer maintains, or was "asset," as is suggested, the statement by Mr. Balfour that that £35,000 was an asset representing an amount which was to be paid by the Building Securities Co. was untrue. No one could justify that in any sense. The case is put in this way, that this untrue statement was made by Mr. Balfour at a meeting at which these directors who are now sought to be charged with this breach of trust were present, and that, unless they did not then and there get up and deny it and put it right, they are to be treated as parties to that untrue statement, and as having concealed the transaction. I think it would be pressing that contention against them a great deal too far. I can easily understand that they did not realise the effect of Mr. Balfour's statement about the money being paid at all, and the affidavits which they have filed satisfy me that they thought it was a thing not to be concealed, but a thing rather to be proud of. They thought they had done an uncommonly good thing for this company in putting £35,000 into the shares of the Building Securities Co. Why should they want to conceal it? Why Mr. Balfour should have gone out of his way to make that statement, I do not know; and, although there is some evidence, I think the evidence is far too weak to justify us in holding these other directors liable for these moneys on the ground that they were parties to a fraud in concealing what they had done. The only deduction which I can draw from the evidence is that it would not be right—I do not think that any jury would do it—to saddle these directors with a charge of fraud in respect of this transaction—either fraud or concealment, and I acquit them of it altogether. It appears to me, therefore, although if the true view is that this was an ultra vires transaction they would be liable to replace the money, they are protected by the Statute of Limitations, to which I have referred, and that the appeal against the learned judge's decision as regards this matter must be dismissed with costs as against all of them.

I now come to the second transaction. It appears that in July, 1889, a sum of £5,200 was invested in the purchase of shares of this Building Securities Co. There were 1,040 shares of £5 each which were applied for and taken. They were not paid for in cash at the time. They were paid for by three bills at various dates. At a board meeting on July 1, 1889, neither Mr. Brock nor Mr. Theobald, who are sought to be made liable for this improper investment, were present. On Oct. 9, 1889, after two of the bills which had been given had become due, and had been paid, and while the third bill was running and before it became due, the minutes of the meeting of July 1, 1889, were confirmed with others. At that confirmation meeting, on Oct. 9, 1889, Mr. Theobald and Mr. Brock were both present, and it is because Mr. Theobald was present at that meeting that it is sought to charge him with liabilities in respect of this sum. It is quite certain upon the evidence that he had nothing to do with the transaction originally. He was away on the sea. The case against him is simply that he was party to that confirmation. It is put in this way, that he thereby adopted or ratified it, and that he at all events might have taken legal proceedings, or induced the company to take legal proceedings, to set aside the transaction. I am not aware of any authority which goes the length of saying that a director who is not a party to any misapplication of a company's funds is liable for not taking legal proceedings to upset the transaction after the thing is done. I do not think it would be in accordance with the principles applicable to these cases if we were now for the first time to make a precedent of that kind. I am satisfied from Mr. Theobald's affidavit that he knew nothing at all about the matter; and that when he did come back, and found out what was done, in any business point of view it was too late. The matter was over so far as he was concerned. It appears to me, therefore, that WRIGHT, J., was quite right in exonerating Mr. Theobald from all liability in respect of that sum.

As regards Mr. Brock the case is very different. Mr. Brock, although he was absent in July, 1889, had been a director of this company for some time, and had been chairman of the directors. When he came back, which he did before Oct. 9, 1889, he took the chair at the meeting, and signed the resolutions confirming what had taken place. If the matter had stood there I should have thought that he would have been in the same position as Mr. Theobald. But the case does not stop there, for on April 17, 1890, there was a meeting at which Mr. Brock appears

A to have made a speech in which he said :

"We carefully considered the matter, and, having regard to the excellent return on our then holding and our confidence in the management of the company, we deemed it advisable that we should exercise our right of subscription, and we have since had no reason to regret the decision, seeing that the company is paying an eminently satisfactory dividend of 7 per cent."

B It is impossible, I think, after that to say that Mr. Brock knew no more about the matter than Mr. Theobald. I cannot construe that speech—even making all allowance for the use of the word "we"—as amounting to anything else than a statement by Mr. Brock that "we," including the directors and including himself, "carefully considered" this application before they made up their minds to accept that offer. He was chairman from April, and his chairmanship covered the whole period of the negotiations which led to this, and he says : "We carefully considered the matter, and we deemed it advisable that we should exercise our right of subscription." I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Brock was so mixed up in this, and took so active a part in it, from his own statement, that he is liable. I think that his view was that until the matter got into liquidation it was a judicious thing to do. He not only approved of it, but he thought it was an uncommonly good thing for the shareholders, and he claims credit to himself for his intelligence in seeing, as he thought, that it was an uncommonly good thing. I take him as doing exactly what he says he did—exercising his judgment upon it, believing it was intra vires, perfectly honestly, but making a mistake as to the powers of directors in investing money. As regards him, therefore, it appears to me that the appeal must succeed, and he must be held liable for this £5,200. He will be liable with the two other directors, but there is no appeal with regard to the other two.

KAY, L.J.—The transaction as to the £35,000 seems to have been of this kind. The Lands Allotment Co. had been formed, and Hobbs, the builder, became indebted to them in a sum of £35,000. Afterwards, in November, 1884, the Building Securities Co. was formed. We are told that it was formed for the purpose, among other things, of taking over the building business of Hobbs. Then the parties were in this position. The Building Securities Co. were going to buy Hobbs's business, and they would owe to Hobbs a large sum for the purchase of that business. Hobbs was indebted in £35,000 to the Lands Allotment Co., and an arrangement was made between Hobbs, the Lands Allotment Co., and the Building Securities Co., under which the Building Securities Co. were to pay Hobbs's debt upon condition that the £35,000 should be invested in shares of the Building Securities Co. It was a kind of compromise of the indebtedness of Hobbs to the Lands Allotment Co. I do not know what all the circumstances were, but it is quite possible it may have been the best way of getting Hobbs's debt paid, because it seems to me that these Building Securities Co. shares were very valuable at that time and for some while afterwards, and paid a large dividend for years after that time.

I will not pause to consider whether that was intra vires of the Lands Allotment Co. or ultra vires. But it would require a great deal of argument to convince me that the directors of a company like the Lands Allotment Co. might not make a compromise of that kind, if it was a compromise, with a person largely indebted to their company. I conceive that the directors of every company, being the managing agents of a trading concern, have considerable authority and power in dealing with outstanding debts due to the concern. It is quite possible that this may have been the very best arrangement that could have been made for compromising the large liability of Hobbs to the Lands Allotment Co. But I will assume that it was not; and will treat this, for the purpose of argument, as an investment in shares of the Building Securities Co. of £35,000, moneys which were the moneys of the Lands Allotment Co. I am very clearly of opinion that, if they did buy shares in that company, it might be an act beyond their powers. The buying of the shares was not, be it observed, as an interim investment of moneys that they wanted at the time to invest in certain securities; but it appears they did buy the shares as shareholders out and out in this Building Securities Co. They intended to hold the shares, and they did hold them for a very long time afterwards. A

Then comes the question, what was the position of the directors who made an improper and ultra vires investment of that kind? Case after case has decided that directors of trading companies are not for all purposes trustees, or in the position of trustees or quasi-trustees, or to be treated as trustees in any sense. B But if they deal with the funds of a company, although those funds are not absolutely vested in them, but are funds which are under their control, in a manner which is beyond their powers, then, as to that dealing, they are treated as having committed a breach of trust. I do not believe that there has ever been any dissent from the language of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Forest of Dean Coal Mining Co. (1) (10 Ch.D. at p. 453), which I am citing from the judgment in Re Faure Electric Accumulator Co. (2) (40 Ch.D. at p. 151), where the position of directors of a trading company is conveniently stated. SIR GEORGE JESSEL said: C

"They are no doubt trustees of assets which have come into their hands, or which are under their control, but they are not trustees of a debt due to the company." D

So that when directors get assets of their company under their control or into their hands, and deal with them in a way which is beyond the powers of the company, they are liable as for a breach of trust.

That is not denied, but it is said that directors are not absolutely trustees; that they are quasi-trustees; and that, being in that position, they do not come within, and were designedly omitted from, the definition of "trustee" in the Trustee Act, 1888, which is now superseded by the Trustee Act, 1893. One section of the Act of 1888 applying to this case limits the liability of trustees. With deference I entirely dissent from that argument. It seems to me that the words used in the definition clause of that Act—the first section—do expressly include precisely such a case as a director dealing with moneys of the company in such a way as to make him liable as trustee. For the purposes of that Act, the expression "trustee" is to be deemed to include an executor or administrator, and a trustee whose trust arises by construction or implication of law as well as an express trustee. How does this obligation of a director and trustee arise if it does not arise "by construction or implication of law?" It seems to me that the words are apt to include that very case, and were intended to include a case of that kind. It is said by way of argument, "How is it, then, that the definition clause does not expressly include directors?" But it would have been quite wrong to have included directors, because directors are not always trustees. As directors they are not trustees at all. They are only trustees qua the particular property which is in their hands or under their control, and which they have applied in a manner which is beyond the powers of the company. I conceive that qua such funds they are constructive trustees, or trustees by implication of law, and they come exactly within the words of this definition in the Trustee Act, 1888. Therefore, s. 8 of that Act, which applies to all persons who come within the definition of "trustee," does operate to exonerate these directors from that misapplication of funds to which otherwise I assume they would have been liable. E F G H

Then it is urged that, if that was so, still the fact of this investment was concealed by a fraud of one of the directors in which the other directors concurred; and that this concealment by fraud prevents time from running in favour of the directors until the fact was discovered. I do not wish at all, at present, to express any decided opinion whether, if the fraudulent statement could be traced to all these directors, and they could be made responsible for it, time would or would not run until it was discovered. The ordinary application of that doctrine is in cases where you are suing people and the ground of your action is the fraud which has been committed. Undoubtedly, where the ground of your action is fraud, time I

- A does not begin to run until the discovery of the fraud. It is not, however, quite the same thing where the ground of the action is not fraud, at all, but as here, a perfectly honest misapplication of money—a misapplication made by persons who might not unreasonably believe that they had power to do that which they were doing, and which was not, as far as any one of them was concerned, in the least degree a corrupt dealing. The investment of these moneys, however wrong it
- B might be with regard to the powers of the company, as being beyond those powers, could in no sense be said to be a fraud on the part of the directors who made the investment. I do not wish to express any decided opinion as regards the rights of the shareholders in respect of that investment, if the fact of that investment had been fraudulently concealed from the shareholders, it might be that time would not begin to run until the discovery of the facts which gave them a right to sue.
- C But now the question is: Is that fraud—if there was a fraud—brought home so clearly to these directors whom it is now sought to make liable so as to bring them within that doctrine, if such a doctrine exists? If we were dealing with Mr. Balfour, the case would undoubtedly be very different, because Mr. Balfour, according to the evidence before us, did make a statement at a public meeting of the shareholders which was, whichever view you take of the actual word used—whether it was
- D “estate” or “asset”—an utterly untrue statement. If the action were against Mr. Balfour, and it was said: “Time did not begin to run in your favour until the untruth of that statement was discovered by the shareholders, because that statement put them off their guard completely, and prevented them knowing the facts which gave them a right to sue you,” I do not say that that argument might not prevail. But we have not got Mr. Balfour before us at all. The persons who are
- E before us are persons who were present at that meeting, and it is sought to make them liable because they, being present at that meeting, must be taken to have heard Mr. Balfour’s statement, and, therefore, to have concurred in that statement and thus to have joined in misleading the shareholders. I am not prepared to say that the evidence is insufficient. All the evidence we have got is that they were
- F at the meeting. I have no doubt that the directors at the time—all those directors, at any rate, who are now sought to be charged—believed, as they say they believed, that this was a perfectly valid and proper transaction. They had no ground whatever for concealing it. And in order to bind them by a false statement of this kind made by Mr. Balfour, speaking for myself, I should require it to be proved very clearly that they thoroughly apprehended the falseness of the statement that was made, and concurred in it for the purpose of deceiving the shareholders who were
- G present. I do not think the evidence comes up to that. The mere fact that they were present at the meeting does not seem to me enough to enable the court to treat them as having committed a fraud for the purpose of concealing the actual facts from the shareholders in reference to this investment in the shares. Therefore I think that the learned judge in the court below was quite right in treating them as absolved from this investment by the lapse of time that has taken place.
- H I will only say a very few words with reference to the other point, as to the liability of Brock, together with the two gentlemen who have been declared liable—namely, Barnard and Dresser—for the second investment in the shares of the Building Securities Co. That investment was not made till 1889, and therefore six years had not run when these proceedings were taken against them to make them liable. The Statute of Limitations, therefore, has nothing to do with that
- I case, and the only question is: Who were the persons who really did concur in making that investment—a thing beyond the powers of the company? Any director who did concur in that misapplication of the funds of the company to the extent of £5,200 would be jointly and severally liable. Barnard and Dresser were the persons who were present at the meeting of July 1, 1889, when it was resolved to make this purchase of further shares in the Building Securities Co.; they have been declared liable, and I understand that there is no appeal on their part. Brock was at that time, and had been for some time previously, the chairman of the company. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence]. Can anyone believe that the investment was made without his concurrence? I have listened with interest to all the ingenious arguments of his counsel on the subject of the editorial "we" and so on. But the editorial "we" is not quite the same thing as the "we" of a director, who, being at the time the chairman of a company, is speaking of an investment, and says: "We have carefully considered the matter, and agree that an investment ought to be made." I cannot possibly allow him to escape under that extremely ingenious argument from the conclusion to which I have come by reason of this statement of his own, that he was one of the persons who, before the investment was made, concurred in the propriety of making that investment—carefully considered it and agreed that it should be done. That being so, I think it is clear that he must be made liable, together with Dresser and Barnard. As to Theobald, there is nothing to make him party to this further investment, except the fact that he was present at the meeting of Oct. 9, 1889, at which, among other things, the minutes of the meeting of July 1, 1889, were read and confirmed. I agree with LINDLEY, L.J., that there was not enough in that circumstance alone to make him liable, looking to the evidence that he himself has given. Therefore, I think that Theobald cannot be made liable as to this further investment.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—My brethren who have preceded me have fully covered this case with regard to the different points which had to be adjudicated upon, and I entirely agree with them, and have nothing to add thereto. I wish, however, to say one word concerning the Trustee Act, 1888, about which so much has been properly said by counsel for the Official Receiver. As I understand the argument, it is this: "There may be an express trustee; there may be a trustee whose trust arises by implication of law; and there may be a tertium quid." The tertium quid suggested was a gentleman in a fiduciary position. I do not agree with counsel about that tertium quid. It seems to me that the tertium quid is a man who is not an express trustee, and whose trust does not arise by implication of law. If that be the true reading of this section, it is perfectly obvious—supposing these gentlemen come within what I term the tertium quid—that these gentlemen have not the Statute of Limitations to rely upon against the present claim. If, however, they are "express trustees" or "trustees whose trust arises by implication of law," then they have the Statute of Limitations to rely upon by virtue of the relief which is afforded by the Act of 1888, unless they are deprived thereof by reason of the three exceptions which are set out in s. 8 of that Act. Therefore, it seems to me, whichever way you take this case, the Statute of Limitations is available for these gentlemen.

I now come to another point, namely, the question of fraudulent concealment. That does not arise, it seems to me, under this Act of 1888 at all. It has nothing to do with it. It arises upon the fact that, although under both statutes the defendant may after six years plead the Statute of Limitations, yet, if there had been a sufficient fraudulent concealment, then he cannot set up the statutory defence which is given to him, namely, that the transaction occurred six years before the date of the writ. It seems to me, therefore, that, as regards this sum of £35,000, the directors may set up the Statute of Limitations, because they are trustees whose trust arises by implication of law. As regards Brock, I agree with what the lords justices have said. He did think he was acting in the best interests of the company, but he did that which was ultra vires—that which he cannot justify, and, therefore, he must be made liable with Barnard and Dresser.

By s. 72 of the County Courts Act, 1888 [replaced in almost identical terms by s. 89 of the County Courts Act, 1959 (39 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 168)] a solicitor who is "acting generally in the action or matter" for a party thereto is given a right of audience in a county court and that right "shall not be excluded by reason only that he is in the permanent and exclusive employment of any other solicitor."

When a firm of solicitors is retained by a party to proceedings in the county court each member may be properly described as "acting generally in the action" for the party retaining the firm, but an admitted managing clerk employed by the firm, who is not himself retained, is not in that position, and, therefore, he has no right of audience in the court. Whether or not an admitted managing clerk has a right of audience depends on whether he is found as a fact to have been retained by the party to the action or matter and acting generally for him therein. For a solicitor to be said to be acting generally for a party the relation of solicitor and client must exist between him and that party.

Order Nisi calling upon His Honour JUDGE SNAGGE, the judge of the county court of Oxfordshire holden at Oxford, and Samuel Simmonds, to show cause why the said judge should not hear one Arthur Addison, a solicitor of the Supreme Court claiming to appear and address the court on an application for a new trial on behalf of one Silas Turner, the defendant in an action between the said Simmonds, plaintiff, and the said Turner, defendant, pending in the said county court.

In the action of Simmonds v. Turner the plaintiff claimed a quarter's rent of certain premises and a sum in respect of the repairs to the premises. The action was tried before the county court judge, who nonsuited the plaintiff. An application was made on behalf of the plaintiff for a new trial. The solicitors acting on behalf of the defendant were Thomas Mallam & Co., and the present applicant Arthur Addison, himself a solicitor of the Supreme Court, was in their permanent and exclusive employment. The applicant Addison appeared on behalf of the defendant to oppose the application for a new trial, and claimed the right to be heard on behalf of the defendant. The county court judge declined to allow the applicant to address the court as of right, but offered to grant him leave to do so. The applicant refused to apply for leave to address the court, and the application for a new trial was adjourned until the opinion of the Divisional Court had been obtained upon the question whether the applicant had a right to appear and address the county court.

June 20, 1894. The following judgments were read.

HENN COLLINS, J.—This is an order calling upon the judge of the county court of Oxfordshire to show cause why he should not hear one Arthur Addison, a solicitor of the Supreme Court, claiming to appear and address the court on behalf of one Silas Turner, the defendant in an action in the said county court. Mr. Addison is a fully-qualified solicitor, and is the managing clerk to Messrs. Mallam & Co., who were the solicitors retained by the defendant in the action. At the hearing on Jan. 25, he, as he states in the affidavit on which the order was obtained, "on the instructions of his principals, Messrs. Mallam & Co., appeared for the defendant," in whose favour the action was decided, and on Feb. 22 he appeared to oppose a motion for a new trial "by the direction of his employers, the said Messrs. Mallam & Co., and with the assent of the said defendant." He further avers that he has had the entire management on behalf of the defendant of the proceedings in the action from the commencement. It was on this last occasion—viz., Feb. 22, on the motion for the new trial—that the question for our decision arose. Mr. Addison then claimed to be heard as of right to show cause on behalf of the defendant, and the learned county court judge, while offering to hear him by leave, declined to admit his claim to be heard as of right. The learned county court judge finds as a fact—and this was a matter of fact for his decision—that Mr. Addison was not the solicitor acting generally in the action for the defendant, and that the firm of Mallam & Co. were the solicitors so acting.

The question turns upon s. 72 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which runs as follows :

"It shall be lawful for any party to an action or matter or for a solicitor being a solicitor acting generally in the action or matter for such party, but not a solicitor retained as an advocate by such first-mentioned solicitor, or for a barrister retained by or on behalf of any party on either side, but without any right of exclusive audience, or, by leave of the judge, for any other person allowed by the judge to appear instead of any party, to address the court, but subject to such regulations as the judge may from time to time prescribe for the orderly transaction of the business of the court, the right of a solicitor to address the court shall not be excluded by reason only that he is in the permanent and exclusive employment of any other solicitor."

The question is whether, under the provision of the above section and on the facts as found by the learned judge, Mr. Addison was entitled as of right to be heard. The learned judge has held that he was not. With the exception of the concluding words, the section is identical with that of the earlier County Courts Act, 1852, s. 10. Counsel for Mr. Addison did not indeed admit that under the former Act his client would have no right of audience, but his main contention was that the new words, at all events, made it clear that the right now existed. It is to be observed that the new words do not in terms confer any right on any person not theretofore entitled. They merely provide for the removal of a possible bar to a right otherwise complete. This throws us back on the first part of the section to see whether it conferred a prima facie right on Mr. Addison to address the court. If so, he was not disabled from exercising such right by the fact that he was in the permanent and exclusive employment of Messrs. Mallam & Co.

What, then, is the standard laid down by the section by which to determine whether a solicitor is entitled to address the court? It is that he must be "a solicitor acting generally in the action or matter for a party in the action or matter."

A Does this embrace a solicitor who is not retained by the party, but who appears only as the servant or agent of the solicitor or firm so retained under orders received from him or them? There is weighty authority under the former statute that it did not. BLACKBURN, J., dealing with the same words in R. v. Spooner (1) (18 L.T. at p. 326), L.T.Rep.N.S. 325, said:

B "There can only be one attorney for a party at a time";

and in Bookham v. Potter, Ex parte Rogers (2) MONTAGUE SMITH, J., says (L.R. 3 C.P. at p. 494):

C "Under s. 10 of 15 & 16 Vict., c. 54 [County Courts Act, 1852] the only attorney who is entitled to be heard in the county court is the attorney acting generally in the action for the party. . . . If he was acting as attorney generally in the action the fact of his being clerk to another attorney would not preclude his right to be heard. But the matter of fact was for the consideration and determination of the judge. If he found that he was not acting as the attorney generally in the action, his refusal to hear him was quite right."

D BOVILL, C.J., with whom WILLIS, J., concurred, clearly explains the circumstances which would under that statute have entitled a managing clerk to audience. He says (ibid., at pp. 493, 494):

E "Although it turns out that that point is not raised by the affidavit upon which the rule is founded, I think it right to say that, in my opinion, there is nothing in the fact of a gentleman being a clerk to another to prevent his being heard as the attorney in the cause. He must, however, satisfy the requirement of the statute 15 & 16 Vict., c. 54, s. 10, by showing that he is the attorney acting generally in the cause. . . . Who is to determine whether or not the attorney is acting generally in the action? The judge before whom the party appears has the best means of determining that question. . . . he seems to have held that Mr. Rogers was acting merely as clerk to Mr. Stenning, and was not engaged generally as attorney in the cause."

F It is obvious, therefore, that the judges in that case thought that, though a managing clerk might be retained by and act for the party generally in the action, it would be a question of fact whether he was acting as such or merely as clerk for somebody else, and that both the principal and the clerk could not at the same time be the attorney acting generally in the action. But it is suggested that all these learned judges did not realise or remember that the words of the statute are "an attorney" and not "the attorney" acting generally in the action. G BOVILL, C.J., however, begins by quoting the exact words of the statute, and it seems clear to me that they must have been present to the minds of all the judges. I think the indefinite article is used in the statute because it is dealing with any action and any party to an action and with any one of certain classes—viz., solicitors and barristers—and the indefinite article is, therefore, more appropriate; H but when in a given case a solicitor or firm of solicitors is retained, he or it becomes the solicitor or firm of solicitors acting generally in the action or matter.

I I think a solicitor cannot be said to be a solicitor acting generally in the action or matter for a party unless the relation of solicitor and client exist between him and such party. It may well be that when a firm is retained each member of the firm may be described as a solicitor acting generally in the action for the party who retains him, but I think the same could not be said of a managing clerk who was not retained. The position of managing clerk, when held by a solicitor, though it does not exclude him, does not qualify him to claim audience. That must depend, I think, on whether he is found as a fact to be a solicitor retained by a party and acting generally for him in the action or matter. I think that the observations of LORD CAIRNS, L.J., in Re Broadhouse, Ex parte Broadhouse (3) are applicable to this case. In speaking of s. 212 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, which authorised solicitors to appear and plead without employing counsel, he says (2 Ch. App. at pp. 658, 659):

"That section . . . did not, in any way, alter the ordinary character in which alone a solicitor is entitled to appear in any court, viz., as the solicitor of a particular client. His appearing in that character is the condition of his being heard, and for obvious reasons. The main object of allowing and favouring the appearance of a solicitor as representing another person is, that the court should have before it a person who on the one hand is under an obligation to the court because he is one of its officers, and on the other hand is under an obligation to the suitor because he is in privity with him, and is the actual person who represents him. Unless that chain of connection is maintained and kept complete, the object of allowing solicitors to appear on behalf of other parties is entirely defeated."

Acting upon this view, the court (LORD CAIRNS and ROLT, L.JJ.) upheld the refusal of the commissioners [in bankruptcy] to hear a gentleman whose position was very similar to that of Mr. Addison in this case, viz., a qualified solicitor acting as managing clerk for the firm actually retained. I think the standard by which the court try the right of audience in that case is virtually the same as that laid down by the statute in the case before us. The test put by LORD CAIRNS was: "Is the person who claims audience the solicitor of a particular client?" The condition required by the statute is that he shall be "a solicitor acting generally for a party in the action or matter," and it seems to me that the same reasons which prevented him having audience in that case as solicitor for the bankrupt would prevent him from having audience in this case as a solicitor acting generally for the defendant in the action. In both cases the objection of want of privity between him and the client equally applies. The only difference between the two cases lies in the use of the indefinite article in the statute which I have already considered. I think the legislature cannot have intended, merely by using the indefinite instead of the definite article, to create a class of advocates open to the objections pointed out by LORD CAIRNS.

If this is the proper view of the words—"a solicitor acting generally in the action or matter for such party," have the added words of the new section altered the law? I think not. I think they only remove a possible doubt, and expressly enact the proposition covered by the simile in Bookham v. Potter, Ex parte Rogers (2) viz., that the fact that a qualified solicitor is managing clerk to someone else shall not of itself debar him from having audience as solicitor for a party, provided he can show that he is such solicitor, which in this case he cannot. This is the view taken by JUDGE HEYWOOD in his able work ANNUAL COUNTY COURT PRACTICE, 1894 Edn., at p. 236, and by the learned judge in the present case, with the conclusion and reasoning of whose judgment I agree. I am, therefore, of opinion that this order must be discharged.

CAYE, J.—If this had been res nova, I should have found great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the words in the County Court Act, 1852, s. 10:

"It shall be lawful for the party to the suit or other proceeding, or for an attorney of one of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of Record, being an attorney acting generally in the action for such party" mean: "It shall be lawful for the party to the suit or other proceeding, or for an attorney of one of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of Record, being the attorney acting generally in the action;" and I should have been at a loss to suggest any reason why the Act should use this roundabout expression instead of saying simply, "It shall be lawful for the party to the suit or other proceeding, or for his attorney, being an attorney of one of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of Record." But, upon consideration of the language used by the judges in Bookham v. Potter, Ex parte Rogers (2), and in the face of the opinion of my brother HENN COLLINS, I feel that it is not open to me to consider that question, and that I must deal with the construction of that section as if the words used had been, "An attorney, etc.,

A being the attorney acting generally in the action." When I come to interpret those words I respectfully concur in the opinion of LORD BLACKBURN that there can only be one attorney for a party at a time, and that the words "the attorney for the party" do not include the managing clerk of the attorney in whose name the proceedings in the action are conducted. If, as under these circumstances I am bound to hold, that is the true construction of the County Courts Act, 1852, s. 10,

B I do not see how I can put a different construction on what are practically, if not identically, the same words in the statute of 1888.

It has been contended, however, that the words of the statute of 1888—

"The right of a solicitor to address the court shall not be excluded by reason only that he is in the permanent and exclusive employment of any other solicitor"

C enable us to decide this case in favour of the applicant. If I could read the words as they stand: "A solicitor being a solicitor acting generally in the action or matter for such party"—I should think that there was great force in this contention. The words naturally apply to a managing clerk for a solicitor who is himself a solicitor, and who, as managing clerk, has had the management and control of the action, and I do not understand what the expression "exclusive employment" means, unless it means that he is excluded from carrying on business on his own account. As I have said, I think I am precluded from reading the words as they stand. The clause says that

"the right of a solicitor to address the court shall not be excluded by reason only that he is in the permanent and exclusive employment of any other solicitor."

E

But the right of a solicitor who is a managing clerk of the solicitor in the action, and who has had the management and control of the proceedings in the action, is not excluded on the ground specified in the clause, but on the ground that he is not the solicitor acting generally in the action. I am, therefore, compelled to come to the somewhat absurd conclusion that this clause has no meaning at all, and does not in any way affect the construction of the Act. It is said that it refers to a managing clerk to a solicitor who is allowed to carry on business in the county court without limit in his own name and for his own benefit. But I confess I do not see how such a man can be said to be in the exclusive employment of the solicitor whose managing clerk he is, and I very much doubt whether such arrangements exist to any considerable extent in the profession. I have a strong suspicion that the clause in question was intended to put an end, in favour of managing clerks who are also solicitors, to the question whether they could address the court in matters in which they had been acting generally for the party. If this is so, I am afraid the words used are not sufficient, so long as I am obliged to construe the words "being a solicitor acting generally in the action" as meaning the same thing as the words "being the solicitor acting generally in the action."

F

G

H I agree, therefore, that this order must be discharged.

Where an order for an attachment is made against a debtor under s. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, the Court of Appeal will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the judge making the order unless it can be shown that he has not exercised his discretion in the particular case, or that he has manifestly proceeded on a wrong ground.

One of two trustees under a will so trusted his co-trustee that he handed over to him trust money which the co-trustee misapplied. A judge ordered an attachment to issue against the first trustee on the ground that a trustee who trusted his co-trustee and remitted trust money to him without satisfying himself that it was being properly dealt with was dishonest and fraudulent.

Held: the judge had wrongly exercised his discretion under the Act of 1874, and the order would be discharged.

Appeal against a decision of KEKEWICH, J., ordering writs of attachment to issue against the two defendants, Andrews and Hooton, trustees and executors under the will of Albert Smith, deceased, who died in September, 1891.

On Feb. 11, 1892, an action for the administration of the estate of the deceased was commenced by one of his creditors, and judgment was given in the usual form. On taking the accounts under the judgment the registrar found that a sum of £426 was due to the estate from the defendants jointly, and this sum they were ordered by KEKEWICH, J., on further consideration, by an order dated Aug. 6, 1892, to pay into court within seven days after service of the order. The order was served on Andrews on Oct. 10, and on Hooton on Oct. 11, and was disobeyed by both defendants. On Sept. 8 a receiving order in bankruptcy had in the meantime been made against Andrews. On Oct. 19 notice of motion for an attachment against both the defendants was served on them by the creditor, to whom the conduct of the proceedings had been committed by order of the court. On Nov. 1 Andrews was adjudicated bankrupt.

G

On Nov. 19 KEKEWICH, J., ordered writs of attachment to issue against both the defendants, and from this order they appealed. The learned judge made this order on the ground that Andrews, having accepted the office of trustee, and having simply neglected it, had acted dishonestly, and made himself a fraudulent trustee, and punishable as such. He also found that Hooton's evidence was unsatisfactory, and that his position was worse than that of Andrews.

By s. 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1869:

"... no persons shall . . . be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money. There shall be excepted from the operation of the above enactment . . . 3. Default by a trustee or person acting in a fiduciary capacity, and ordered to pay by a court of equity any sum in his possession or under his control."

By the Debtors Act, 1878:

"In any case coming within s. 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1869 . . . any court or judge, making the order for payment, or having jurisdiction in the action or proceeding in which the order for payment is made, 'may inquire into the case, and (subject to the provisos contained in the said section) may grant or refuse, either absolutely or upon terms, any application for a writ of attachment . . .'"

Feb. 13, 1894. LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment of the court.—This is an appeal by two executors and trustees against an order directing a writ of attachment to issue against them under the authority conferred by the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 4 (3), as amended by the Debtors Act, 1878.

On Aug. 6, 1892, an order was made in an action for the administration of their testator's estate on both the appellants to pay into court £426 found due from them jointly; and an order was also made on the appellant Hooton to pay into court £90 found due from him separately. There was no summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate, and the liability of the defendants to pay these sums into court as ordered must be treated as indisputable. On Sept. 8 a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against Andrews. The moneys not being paid, notice of motion for an attachment against both appellants was served on Oct. 19, 1892. Before this motion came on to be heard, viz., on Nov. 1, 1892, Andrews was adjudicated bankrupt. On Nov. 19 the order appealed from for the issue of an attachment against both defendants was made. No proceedings in bankruptcy have been taken against Hooton. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider their cases separately.

It will be convenient to take Hooton's case first, as it is the simpler of the two. He was an executor and trustee; he was ordered to pay money by a judge of the High Court exercising the jurisdiction formerly exercised by courts of equity. The money which he was ordered to pay was the balance of moneys come into his hands, and not accounted for by him. He had not got the money in his possession, nor under his control when the order for the payment of it into court was made, for he had misapplied the money which had come into his hands. But this circumstance did not excuse him from his liability to pay, nor prevent an order for attachment from being made under the Debtors Act, 1869. Courts of equity refuse to allow a man to derive any benefit from his own wrongful conduct, and treat a trustee as still having that which he once had and ought still to have, although he may in fact have wrongfully parted with it.

Acting on this principle, it was decided by the Court of Appeal in Chancery, as early as 1871, that an attachment might issue under s. 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1869, against a trustee who made default in obeying an order to pay into court money which he had received as trustee, but had misapplied before the order for payment was made: Middleton v. Chichester (1); and the construction then put upon the Act has been followed ever since: see Crowther v. Elgood (2); Preston v. Etherington (3). It was pointed out in Middleton v. Chichester (1) by LORD HATHERLEY that all the debts specified in s. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, in respect of which imprisonment was not abolished, were different from ordinary debts, and were "debts the incurring of which were in some degree worthy of being visited with punishment," and he said: "In every case there is something in the character of delinquency pointed out." In 1869, if an order for payment was made under s. 4 and was disobeyed, an attachment was issued as a matter of course. But this was altered by the Debtors Act, 1878, under which a judge applied to for an order for an attachment is entrusted with a discretion to grant or refuse the order. If, therefore, an order for attachment is made in a case falling within s. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, this court will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the judge making the order, unless it can be shown that he has not exercised his discretion in the particular case, or that he has manifestly proceeded on a wrong ground: see Crowther v. Elgood (2). Nothing of the kind is shown in Hooton's case, and his appeal, therefore, ought to be dismissed.

The same principles are applicable to Andrews' case, save so far as they are affected by his bankruptcy. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, contains a section, viz.,

A s. 9 (1) [see now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 7], which is as follows :

“On the making of a receiving order an official receiver shall be thereby constituted receiver of the property of the debtor, and thereafter, except as directed by this Act, no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor in respect of the debt, or shall commence any action or other legal proceedings, unless with the leave of the court, and on such terms as the court may impose.”

B

This section is in substance the same as the corresponding section in the earlier Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (s. 12). This last section was held by the Court of Appeal, in Cobham v. Dalton (4), to prevent an arrest without the leave of the Court of Bankruptcy, even in cases falling within s. 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1869.

C

It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine this case, and to determine whether it can be regarded as an authority which ought still to be followed, regard being had to subsequent legislation and to more recent decisions. The subsequent legislation which is important consists, first, of the Debtors Act, 1878, which has been already noticed; and, secondly, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which has replaced the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. The operative words in s. 9 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, are the same as those in s. 12 of the previous Act of 1869; and, although the two sections are not exactly the same, there is no difference between them material for the present purpose. Under both Acts, money due from a trustee in respect of a breach of trust, whether fraudulent or not, is a debt provable against his estate in the event of his bankruptcy.

E

But there is a very remarkable difference between the two Acts as regards the effect of an order of discharge; for while under s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, an order of discharge does not release a bankrupt from any breach of trust, under s. 30 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [see now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 26], an order of discharge does release a bankrupt from all breaches of trust except fraudulent breaches of trust to which he was a party.

F

In Cobham v. Dalton (4), a defaulting trustee had been ordered to pay money into court; and, on the same day that the order was made, he was adjudicated bankrupt. An order for his attachment was afterwards made ex parte, and he was arrested. He then applied in Chancery to be discharged. His application was refused. He appealed, and his appeal was allowed. The Court of Appeal treated s. 12 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, as applicable to the case, and treated the money ordered to be paid into court as a provable debt, although it was not a debt due to the person who obtained the order to pay and the order for the attachment. The court further held that, the debt being a provable debt, the bankrupt was protected until discharged from arrest in respect of it; but that, as the Act then in force did not discharge him from the debt, he could be attached for it after his discharge.

G

If the principle of this case is to be applied to the present case, it will follow that Andrews ought not to be arrested pending his bankruptcy, nor after his discharge, unless his liability to pay the £426 arose from some fraudulent breach of trust to which he was a party, which is not the case. Although Cobham v. Dalton (4) was decided in 1875, and Middleton v. Chichester (1) was decided in 1871, and the lords justices who decided Cobham v. Dalton (4) were members of the court which decided Middleton v. Chichester (1), the view there taken and expressed with reference to the punitive character of s. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, seems to have been overlooked by them. JAMES, L.J., does not allude to it. MELLISH, L.J., said (10 Ch. App. at p. 657):

I

“Now, arrest for debt is intended as a means of enforcing payment, not as a punishment, for if the party pays the debt he is entitled to be discharged.”

This observation was true of ordinary debts (Re M'Williams (5); Lees v. Newton (6)); but not of obligations to pay under orders made under s. 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1869.

The punitive character of s. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, which was pointed out in Middleton v. Chichester (1), has been since so often recognised that it cannot now be questioned: see Marris v. Ingram (7); Re Gent, Gent-Davis v. Harris (8); although the court has, under the Act of 1878, a discretion to grant or refuse an attachment in cases falling within it, and in one of the latest cases, viz., Earl of Aylesford v. Earl Poulett (9), an attachment against a defaulting trustee was refused. Re Ryley, Ex parte Official Receiver (10), Re Manning (11), Preston v. Etherington (3), and Mitchell v. Simpson (12), were referred to in the course of the argument; but they are not decisions upon the effect of s. 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon commitments under s. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869. In these cases, however, the fact that a commitment under that section is not to be regarded simply as a form of civil process, but as punitive, is distinctly recognised.

Having regard to the Debtors Act, 1878, and to the decisions to which we have referred, it would be clearly wrong now to apply MELLISH, L.J.'s observation in Cobham v. Dalton (4), above quoted, to obligations to pay money in obedience to orders made under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 4 (3). KEKEWICH, J., therefore, had, in our opinion, jurisdiction under the Debtors Act, 1869, to order an attachment against Andrews, notwithstanding his bankruptcy. But in this case the learned judge exercised the discretion reposed in him by the Debtors Act, 1878, upon a ground which, in our opinion, was erroneous. Andrews trusted his co-trustee Hooton, and handed money to him, and this money was misapplied. Andrews is liable for it; but he was not himself guilty of any dishonesty or fraudulent breach of trust. KEKEWICH, J., ordered an attachment to issue against him on the broad ground that every trustee who trusts his co-trustee and remits trust money to him, and does not look sharply after him, is dishonest and fraudulent. We cannot agree in this view, and, consistently with the principles upon which this court acts in reviewing discretionary orders, we have come to the conclusion that Andrews' appeal ought to be allowed.

In doing so, we are not acting contrary to Re Deere (13). In that case, a solicitor who had become bankrupt was attached by a baron of the Court of Exchequer, under s. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and he applied to the Court of Bankruptcy to release him, but the court refused. The Court of Bankruptcy had, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which was then in force, a discretion in the matter; but it declined to interfere, and MELLISH, L.J., said (10 Ch. App. at p. 660):

"I think it is not right that this court should decide the question whether the attachment was issued for punishment, or merely to enforce compliance with the order for payment of money. That question ought to be decided by the court which made the order."

This decision and passage is not in point in the present case, for by "this court" was meant, in Re Deere (13), the Court of Appeal sitting in bankruptcy. That court was not entertaining, and had no jurisdiction to entertain, an appeal from the order for arrest. The present appeal is an appeal from the order for the attachment, and we have to re-hear that order, and Re Deere (13), therefore, is not really in point.

The result, therefore, of the appeal is that it succeeds in Andrews' case, but not in Hooton's. The order appealed from must, therefore, be discharged so far as it affects Andrews, but this is not a case for giving him any costs. As regards Hooton, the order will stand; but nothing will be gained by making him pay the costs of the appeal, nor has he materially put his opponents to expense by joining Andrews in his appeal.

C

To justify the court in granting an interim injunction in a libel action it must come to a decision on the question of libel or no libel before the jury have decided whether it was a libel or not. Therefore, the jurisdiction is of a delicate nature. It ought only to be exercised in the clearest cases, where any jury would say that the matter complained of was libellous, and where, if the jury did not so find, the court would set aside the verdict as unreasonable.

Libels are generally in writing or printing, but this is not necessary. The defamatory matter may be conveyed in some other permanent form. A statue, a caricature, an effigy, chalk marks on a wall, signs, or pictures may constitute a libel. In the present case a wax model held to be capable of being libellous.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of a Divisional Court (MATHEW, J., and HENN COLLINS, J.) granting, in an action for libel, an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants, their agents or servants, from publishing, exhibiting, or causing to be exhibited, the portrait model of the plaintiff, or from advertising, announcing, and placarding the same, in any way to the injury of the plaintiff, pending the trial of an action.

The plaintiff, Alfred John Monson, was tried at Edinburgh in December, 1893, for the murder of Lieutenant Hambrough, at Ardlamont House, Argyllshire. The trial resulted in a verdict of not proven, and the case came to be known as the "Ardlamont Mystery." In January, 1894, the defendants, Madame Tussaud, Ltd., waxwork exhibitors in London, and Louis Tussaud, who had a similar, but smaller, exhibition in Birmingham, placed in their exhibition a portrait model in wax of Monson. Both exhibitions contained a room called the Chamber of Horrors, reserved exclusively for portraits and relics of notorious criminals. In neither case was the plaintiff's figure placed in that chamber. In the case of Madame Tussaud, Ltd., it was placed in a room above and communicating with the Chamber of Horrors by a flight of stairs, and approached through a turnstile, at which an extra payment was made, where there was a notice, "To the Chamber of Horrors." In this room, besides the model of Monson, were relics of Napoleon and Wellington, and three other figures in wax, viz., Mrs. Maybrick, who was convicted of the murder of her husband by poisoning him with arsenic; Pigott, a witness in the Parnell Commission, who committed suicide; and Scott, a man who was associated with Monson in the charge of murdering Mr. Hambrough, but fled from justice and was not tried. In the Chamber of Horrors itself was a representation of the scene of the "Ardlamont tragedy." In the case of Louis Tussaud the plaintiff's figure was placed near a turnstile leading to the Chamber of Horrors, and in the same room with models of Her Majesty the Queen, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other eminent personages. The defendants in this case advertised in the newspapers and by sandwich-men, inviting the public to come and see "The Chamber of Horrors, and the instruments of torture; see Vailant the Anarchist, and Monson of Ardlamont."

Jan. 29, 1894. The following judgments were read.

LORD HALSBURY.—Although I believe there is no difference of opinion among us as to the result of this appeal, I am not so certain that the grounds upon which we act are the same, and the questions raised at the Bar are of such serious general importance that I feel it necessary to explain distinctly the reasons which operate on my mind in the course to be pursued. If the case were to be argued upon the materials which alone were before the Divisional Court I should be of

A opinion that the judgment of the Divisional Court ought to be affirmed. I entirely agree in the reasoning of my brothers MATHEW and HENN COLLINS, JJ., but, for a reason I will state presently, I desire to treat separately the question of the summary intervention of the court by way of interlocutory injunction, and the question of the character of the exhibition, the continuance of which until the trial it is sought to restrain.

B What stands at the head of the inquiry is the character of the exhibition itself. Is it libellous or not?—and in expressing my opinion upon it I am not afraid of prejudicing any right by so doing. The jury will have upon the trial of the action to decide the question ultimately, and I have much too high an opinion of the intelligence of juries to suppose that they would be influenced in their judgment if they learned that a judge or a court had thought that the continuance of an exhibition charged as libellous ought to be restrained until the matter came before them for decision. Indeed, it is a little singular to suppose, considering the controversies which used to arise before the Libel Act, 1792 (Fox's Act), that a jury would on such a question be unduly influenced by the opinion of a judge or a court.

D This exhibition consists of a portrait model of a person recently tried for murder [at Edinburgh, a verdict of Not Proven being returned]. The gun with which the murder was said to have been perpetrated is placed in immediate proximity to the figure, and in another part of the same establishment a model or scenic representation of the place where it was alleged the murder took place. If it stopped there I should have thought that there was enough to make it a very grave and defamatory exhibition. It seems to be thought that, because it could

E be said that it was true that the applicant was tried for murder, this is of itself a sufficient answer. It seems to me that it is no answer at all. Because the applicant was tried for murder, because the circumstances of the trial are necessarily preserved by the report of proceedings in a court of justice (privileged, be it observed, because they are such reports), this does not justify the unauthorised and unprivileged repetition or narration of circumstances of suspicion or of evidence,

F which certainly were urged by the proper authorities as proving that he was guilty of murder. In order to justify a libel the justification must justify in the sense attributed by the innuendo [but see 24 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 123]. It is not the mere words of a written statement being true, or the accuracy of fact in a model or scene, that will render it justifiable. The circumstances of time or place may raise such inferences as will render either libellous, though the words

G may be true and the model exact.
LORD BLACKBURN, in giving judgment in Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty (1) deals with this very question. After expressing his reluctance to express his opinion on cases not before him, he continues (7 App. Cas. at p. 786):

H "I think I may safely say that in a time of panic a statement published in a City article of one of our newspapers that such a one had withdrawn his account from such a bank might have a tendency to shake the credit of the bank, and that those who published such a statement in such a way would know or ought to know that it would be read by persons who, came to the paper for information to guide them as to whom they would trust; and therefore the statement would very probably be understood by such persons as conveying an imputation on the credit of that bank."

I In the same case it was laid down that the test whether a writing is a libel or no is whether, under the circumstances in which the writing was published, reasonable men would be likely to understand it in a libellous sense. It is urged here that no meaning can be attached to this representation calculated to bring the person whose portrait model is exhibited into hatred, contempt, or ridicule, and that, therefore, inasmuch as everybody, or most people, knew that Mr. Monson was tried for murder, it is justifiable to exhibit his portrait as that of the man who was so tried, with the weapon with which the murder was alleged to have been committed and the scene of its commission—that the exhibition amounts to no more than writing: “This is the man who was tried for murder said to be committed by this weapon and in this place.” A

I will assume for the moment that this is a fair representation of what the exhibition means, but I wholly dispute that, if that were the meaning, it would not be libellous. Is it true that you may write with impunity that a person in the course of his career has been tried for some offence? Is it no reflection upon a man's character to say that he has been tried for murder? Will people as readily associate with and accept the companionship of a person of whom such things are said? Let it be observed I am speaking now of the character of the imputation, and not for the moment dealing with the question whether it could be justified on the ground that it was true. If I understand the argument correctly, it comes to this—that the exhibition in question is dedicated to the gratification of public curiosity concerning every person or event which may for the moment be interesting. I confess I regard such a claim with something like dismay. Is it possible to say that everything which has once been known may be reproduced with impunity in print or picture, every incident of a criminal or other trial be produced, and its publication justified? Not only trials but every incident which has actually happened in private life furnish material for an adventurous exhibitor, dramatised peradventure, and justified because, in truth, such and such an incident did really happen. That it is done for gain does not in itself make it unlawful if it be in other respects legitimate; but it is not altogether immaterial as excluding such a publication from the category of those which are made in the fulfilment of some moral or legal duty. B C D

It seems to be assumed that there is no alternative between an innuendo which shall charge the commission of the murder and the admission that no real imputation is conveyed. I think that is an erroneous view. Suppose the innuendo to be that he was a person of ill repute. The justification must allege, not that he was tried for murder, but must justify, if it justifies at all, that he was of ill repute. If it were otherwise the singular result would follow that, if a man has been convicted and undergone his punishment for crime, the law will protect his reputation: see Leyman v. Latimer (2), but if he has been acquitted his reputation is at the mercy of idle gossip for the rest of his life. I have hitherto said nothing of the associations which, to my mind, are almost necessarily connected with the imputation of crime. I have nothing to do with the intention of the exhibitors. It is the impression which would be created on the minds of reasonable men by the juxtaposition of Mr. Monson's model, Mrs. Maybrick's, Scott's, and Pigott's. I think no answer was attempted to be given to the question of counsel for the plaintiff whether there is any one instance of a victim of an accident or an innocent man being exhibited in this part of the establishment. It is, indeed, suggested that a recumbent figure of the Emperor Napoleon is in the same room, but the answer seems to me to be wholly insufficient. If Mr. Monson were a public character, with respect to whom it might be said his public life or his great position is calculated to create an interest, the answer might be plausible; but who knows, or ever did know, anything about Mr. Monson except his connection with the alleged murder at Ardlamont? Why then is he placed near a convicted poisoner, one fugitive from justice not yet captured, and another who escaped justice by suicide? If one adds to that that the scene of the alleged murder is also represented, and admission gained to it by the same fee, and in the place wherein are stored the effigies of many convicted criminals and some scenes of crime, it is a bold assertion to maintain that to the ordinary mind such an association of circumstances suggests no imputation of guilt. E F G H I

But I have now to deal with the question of the summary interposition of the court restraining the continuance of this exhibition until the trial of the action. Two points arise upon it. In the first place, it is said that the court ought not to pronounce anything to be a libel when that very question must afterwards be submitted to the judgment of a jury; and secondly, that the question has already

A been concluded by authority in this court. Sitting here, I admit that I am bound by a former decision of this court. With respect to the first point, my answer is, that the legislature in 1873 and 1875 gave the power by the unqualified language of its enactment to do the very thing in question wherever the court should deem it "just and convenient" [see Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (8), replaced by s. 45 of Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925].

B Had it thought right to limit the exercise of such power to cases where no question should be afterwards determined by a jury, it might have so limited the exercise of such a power to such cases. It cannot be assumed to be ignorant of the state of the law or the practice, and it has enacted in the widest terms the jurisdiction in question. It is not necessary to enumerate, but there are other examples of jurisdictions where judges must exercise, in the first instance, a judgment which

C must, nevertheless, afterwards be submitted to a jury.

The second objection is one with which I have more delicacy in dealing. As I have already said, I am bound by a former decision of this court, but it is by the decision of the court—by what in fact the court did decide. That is the authority to which I must submit. I have some difficulty in following the argument that a decision of the court on one set of facts is an authority upon another

D and a totally different set of facts. Of course, if the two sets of facts are governed by some principle of law, the principle of law affirmed by the court is equally authoritative to whatever facts the principle may be applied. But where the strength and cogency of the facts themselves, or the inference derived therefrom, is in debate, I cannot, as a matter of reasoning, compare one set of facts with another and bring them within any governing principle. Nor am I helped by a

E conjecture as to what a jury would then do in a supposed case, and what a court of review would do if the jury did it.

In Bonnard v. Perryman (3), affirming the former authority before the Master of the Rolls, it was laid down, and I cheerfully accept the proposition, that the court ought not to interfere by interlocutory injunction unless it was "a clear case." Different forms of expression are used by different judges to indicate the degree of clearness which ought to be brought home to the mind of a judge before he exercises the power now in question. But it is a canon of construction too familiar to render more than an allusion to it necessary, that expressions, however general, and phrases, however wide, are cut down and qualified by the subject-matter with respect to which they are uttered. If I were to understand the test suggested to be applicable to all cases, so that it practically excluded actions of

F libel from the operation of the Judicature Acts with respect to granting interlocutory injunctions, it would be to overrule the legislature—a power which is not possessed by this or any other court. But, as I have said, I do not so understand the decisions relied upon. The last one speaks of the procedure in question as being only "just and convenient" in exceptional cases—that is, exceptionally clear cases. Something was said as to the procedure being only applicable to trade

G libels. I think the suggestion is quite unfounded. The Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction in libel cases; but they had jurisdiction to issue injunctions to restrain injuries to trade, and efforts were occasionally made to treat libels as injuries to trade, so as to bring them within the jurisdiction which the Court of Chancery was empowered lawfully to exercise. I should have thought the protection of a man's character was more important than the protection of his trade: see

H Hermann Loog v. Bean (4).

I But whatever may have been the interest of such discussions, the Judicature Acts have rendered all of them idle. In all cases where the court shall think it "just and convenient" the remedy exists. I do not deny that it is a difficult task for any court to determine when the case is so clear that the remedy ought to be applied. In this case it is for the jury, and always would have been for the jury, to determine the question, libel or no libel, since in the unanimous opinion of the judges given to the House of Lords in 1792, while adhering to LORD MANSFIELD's opinion as to the construction of a written document, they frankly admitted that wherever the sense of a paper was to be collected from matter dehors the paper the matter was for the jury, and it need hardly be stated here that "libel or no libel" in this case must be absolutely for the jury. A rule, however, which should place the question of libel or no libel absolutely in the hands of the court so as to control the operation of an Act of Parliament would go far to revive a controversy which has now been laid to rest for upwards of a century: see the observations by PARKER, B., in Parmiter v. Coupland (5), and for this among other reasons I cannot think that the decisions referred to are to be understood in the sense contended for.

In the view, therefore, that I take of the facts, I should have thought this was a clear case of libel, and an equally clear case for the prompt interference of the court to restrain it until the trial of the action. The question, however, remains whether the new evidence adduced, and which was not before the Divisional Court at all, alters that view; and I am of opinion that it does. Of course, if the exhibition in question is made with the consent, expressed or implied, of the applicant for the injunction, there is no ground for the application. The facts may be very shortly stated. The confidential friend of the applicant entered into a written bargain with the proprietors of the exhibition (Madame Tussaud's) to supply them with the clothing and the gun which Mr. Monson was using at the time of Lieutenant Hambrough's death, and an agreement to give a sitting by Mr. Monson to aid the portrait modeller. If this was done with Mr. Monson's authority, there is, of course, an end of the question. In discussing this matter, I am anxious not to prejudice any inquiry which may hereafter be held into these matters. It is enough to say that upon the correspondence and the affidavits of Mr. Monson and Mr. Tottenham it is very doubtful, indeed, to my mind how a jury would find, or what further investigation might disclose. I think that in this state of the evidence the views expressed in the two cases referred to above are binding upon me, and I think, therefore, that this injunction must be dissolved.

LOPES, L.J.—These are two appeals from orders of the Divisional Court granting interlocutory injunctions to restrain the defendants from exhibiting or advertising the exhibition of a wax model representing the plaintiff. The facts of the Ardlamont case are too well known to require recapitulation. Suffice it for the purposes of this appeal to say that the plaintiff was tried in the Ardlamont case at Edinburgh before the Lord Justice Clerk and a jury, and the jury found a verdict of Not Proven. Shortly after the trial the defendants exhibited wax models representing the plaintiff at their establishments. I propose to deal only with the facts in the first case. The facts in the second are practically the same, and the second case must follow the decision in the first.

The ground of the application for an interlocutory injunction was that the exhibition of which the plaintiff complains was calculated to disgrace him and to expose him to public obloquy and contempt, and was, therefore, a libel upon him. The facts with regard to the exhibition of the wax model so far as material are as follows. The figure of the plaintiff was in a room called "Napoleon Room, No. 2," within a turnstile where an extra 6d. was demanded. In this room there were five figures—a large recumbent figure of the Emperor Napoleon, a figure of Mrs. Maybrick, another of Pigott, another of Scott, and one of the plaintiff, with their respective names. There were other objects of interest in the same room—for instance, relics of the Emperor Napoleon and the Duke of Wellington. From the room you could descend a staircase, and then find yourself in what is called "The Chamber of Horrors," where there was a representation of what is called "The Scene of the Ardlamont Mystery."

Libels are generally in writing or printing, but this is not necessary; the defamatory matter may be conveyed in some other permanent form. For instance, a statue, a caricature, an effigy, chalk marks on a wall, signs, or pictures may constitute a libel. The plaintiff's case, therefore, is libel, and the application for an interlocutory injunction must be determined upon the principles which are

A applicable to the granting of injunctions in cases of libel. But it must be borne in mind that the question is not whether what is done is libellous, but whether a case for an interlocutory injunction is made out. Prior to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, no court could grant any injunction in libel. The court of Chancery could grant no injunction in libel, because it could not try a libel. Neither could a court of common law until the Act of 1854, because they had no power to grant injunctions. Whether they had power to grant an interlocutory injunction after 1854 I think doubtful. As a matter of practice they never did; the first instance of their exercising the power in a case of libel was Saxby v. Easterbrook (6), and that after trial.

The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (8) confers a larger power to grant injunctions than existed before. It says:

C "... an injunction may be granted . . . by interlocutory order of the court in all cases in which it shall appear to the court to be just or convenient that such order should be made."

It is upon this section that the plaintiff rests his case. It is not necessary to consider cases that occurred before the coming into operation of the Judicature Acts. William Coulson & Sons v. James Coulson & Co. (7) was decided in 1887, and contains a judgment by the present Master of the Rolls (LORD ESHER) which underlies every subsequent decision on the subject. The Master of the Rolls said in that case (3 T.L.R. at p. 846) that it could not be denied that the court had jurisdiction to grant an interim injunction before trial.

E "It was, however, a most delicate jurisdiction to exercise, because, though Fox's Act only applied to indictments and informations for libel, the practice under that Act had been followed in civil actions for libel, that the question of libel or no libel was for the jury. It was for the jury and not for the court to construe the document, and to say whether it was a libel or not. To justify the court in granting an interim injunction it must come to a decision upon the question of libel or no libel before the jury had decided whether it was a libel or not. Therefore, the jurisdiction was of a delicate nature. It ought only to be exercised in the clearest cases where any jury would say that the matter complained of was libellous, and where, if the jury did not so find, the court would set aside the verdict as unreasonable. The court must also be satisfied that in all probability the alleged libel was untrue, and if written on a privileged occasion, that there was malice on the part of the defendant. It followed from these three rules that the court could only on the rarest occasions exercise their jurisdiction."

In the same year Liverpool Household Stores Association v. Smith (8) came before COTTON, L.J., and myself in this court, and William Coulson & Sons v. James Coulson & Co. (7) was followed and approved.

H The matter of restraining libels on interlocutory motions for injunction was thought of such importance that the question was, in Bonnard v. Perryman (3), argued before the full Court of Appeal, and LORD COLERIDGE, in delivering the considered judgment of the court, said (ante p. 968):

"We entirely approve of, and desire to adopt as our own, the language of LORD ESHER in William Coulson & Sons v. James Coulson & Co. (7):

I "To justify the court in granting an interim injunction it must come to a decision upon the question of libel or not. Therefore the jurisdiction was of a delicate nature. It ought only to be exercised in the clearest cases, where any jury would say that the matter complained of was libellous, and where, if the jury did not so find, the court would set aside the verdict as unreasonable."

I cannot help thinking that a principle was laid down in that case applicable to all libels without a limitation. Comment has been made on the words "in the clearest cases," and it has been asked what those words mean. I think the criticism would be well founded, and they might be complained of as indefinite if they had not been explained, in my judgment in the most exhaustive way, by what follows: "Where any jury would say the matter was libellous, etc."

This is the rule by which we are bound, and I ask myself, if the jury found a verdict for the defendants in this case, would the court set it aside as unreasonable? I propose first to deal with the case as it came before the Divisional Court, and, secondly, as it has come before this court with the additional evidence. I do not think that the Divisional Court were justified in coming to the conclusion that the libel was so clear that, if a verdict passed for the defendants, it must be set aside as "unreasonable." Counsel for the plaintiff contended that the exhibition, under the circumstances, of the plaintiff's figure necessarily involved the imputation that he was criminally connected with the death of Lieutenant Hambrough. Counsel for the defendant contended that the defendant imputed nothing disgraceful or injurious to the character of Monson, and that all that the exhibition meant was: "Here is the likeness of Monson, who was tried in the Ardlamont case, and was not convicted. Here is the likeness of a person who has recently excited much public attention in connection with a trial, the issue of which everyone knows." Is not the inference to be drawn from what was done a proper question for the jury? Suppose a jury came to the conclusion that what was done imputed nothing disgraceful or injurious to the character of Monson, but only that he had become, owing to the notoriety of the case, a subject of public interest, and the defendants exhibited his likeness as likely to bring people to their exhibitions, adding nothing to what was known of him before, and not even associating him with the Ardlamont case, except so far as the scene of the "Ardlamont mystery" was in the room below and the figure in the room above. Would a court say that such a conclusion was so unreasonable that it ought not to be permitted to stand? Might not a jury without being unreasonable consider that any discredit attaching to Monson resulted from the trial, and was not affected by the exhibition of his figure at Madame Tussaud's? Might they not think, without being unreasonable, that the action was brought more in aid of his purse than his personal character?

Put aside the surroundings, and what is there more in this wax figure than the publishing of Monson's likeness in a newspaper, with his name under it, or the display of his likeness in a shop window? Grotesque pictures of individuals may, I doubt not, be in certain circumstances actionable if anyone thought fit to notice them; but I should think it would require an uncommonly strong case to make them the subject of an interlocutory injunction. But it is said: Look at the surroundings. Mrs. Maybrick, Pigott, and Scott (another celebrity in the Ardlamont case), and the Chamber of Horrors below. No doubt this is important and essentially for a jury. Counsel for the plaintiff did not, so far as I recollect, attach much importance to the companionship, for, in answer to me, he said that if Monson's figure had been placed between royal personages it would have been the same. I am unable to agree with the decision of the Divisional Court, and think this case is not brought within the rule laid down in Bonnard v. Perryman (3).

Except for future cases that may occur, I should not have thought it necessary to express disagreement with the decision of the court below, because there is new evidence brought before us which makes it impossible to allow the injunction to issue. As the case will have to be tried, I propose to say little about the evidence. Suffice it to say that there is such a conflict of evidence with regard to Monson's conduct, one side saying he consented to the exhibition of his figure, and the other, in a not very satisfactory way, denying any consent, as to render it imperative that the facts should be investigated by a jury before any injunction is granted. Libel or no libel has, since Fox's Act, whether in civil or criminal cases, been always regarded as essentially a question for the jury. I was much impressed by an observation of DAVEY, L.J., during the argument when he said that at the Chancery Bar he had always contemplated libel with awe. I, as a member of the common law Bar, have always had the same feeling. Criticism is easier

A than composition, and, speaking for myself, I should deeply regret that by any subtle distinctions or ingenious criticism the authority of Bonnard v. Perryman (3), decided by the full Court of Appeal, should be impaired or "whittled" away, and thus some additional fetters be imposed on liberty of speech, and the functions of a jury, which are, in my judgment, unauthorised by that decision. The appeals, therefore, must be allowed.

B

"To justify the court in granting an interim injunction, it must come to a decision upon the question of libel or no libel, before the jury decided whether it was a libel or not. Therefore the jurisdiction was of a delicate nature. It ought only to be exercised in the clearest cases, where any jury would say that the matter complained of was libellous, and where, if the jury did not so find, the court would set aside the verdict as unreasonable."

I understand the Master of the Rolls to have intended the expression,

"where any jury would say that the matter complained of was libellous, and where, if the jury did not so find, the court would set aside the verdict as unreasonable," as an explanation or expansion of what he meant by the words "in the clearest cases." The Master of the Rolls was so understood by COTTON, L.J., in Liverpool Household Stores Association v. Smith (8), and in Bonnard v. Perryman (3) the Lord Chief Justice, delivering the judgment of the full Court of Appeal, approved of and adopted the language of the Master of the Rolls. I understand the court in that case to have judicially laid down for themselves a rule of practice which is binding upon me with regard to the circumstances under which the court ought to grant an interlocutory injunction pending the trial in cases of libel, or, in other words, to have defined the conditions subject to which it is "just and convenient" to grant an injunction in such cases. In Collard v. Marshall (9) CHITTY, J., granted an interlocutory injunction in a case which appeared to him to satisfy those conditions, and it is to be observed that in that case the defendant was willing to treat the motion as the trial of the action, and, therefore, did not require the case to be submitted to a jury.

G

I am of opinion that the principles laid down in the cases referred to are applicable to the present case, and the question, therefore, which the court has to answer is whether the affidavits which have been read and commented on before us disclose a case on which the jury at the trial of the action could properly find only a verdict for the plaintiff. I should have much hesitation in differing from the opinion of two judges of so much experience if the case came before us only on the same affidavits as were used in the court below. But affidavits have been used before us which raise a question of acquiescence and active consent against the plaintiff, and indeed suggest that he sold the right to exhibit his effigy with his own clothes and gun, though he afterwards changed his mind. Of course, these affidavits fall far short of proving such a case against the plaintiff, but they certainly suggest it in a manner and with circumstances which show that there is a case for consideration by a jury, and one on which I decline to speculate or express any opinion what their verdict ought to be when they have complete evidence by examination and cross-examination of the witnesses before them. I may observe that in Bonnard v. Perryman (3), though the libellous character of the publication was, in the language of the Lord Chief Justice, beyond dispute, the court refused to grant an injunction on a mere suggestion by affidavit, without any particulars of a case of justification.

I ought to add that I see no logical distinction for this purpose between a case of libel affecting trade or property and one affecting character only. In basing my judgment on the ground which I have stated, I must not be taken to say whether

I should or should not have agreed with the learned judges in the views expressed by them on the materials before them. Whether an exhibition of Mr. Monson's effigy under the circumstances in the place and with the surroundings mentioned in the affidavits suggests such innuendo as may be assigned to it in the pleadings is a question which will have to be determined by the jury on the trial of the action. I think, therefore, without expressing any opinion on the merits of the case or on the opinions expressed in the court below, it is not a case in which it is proper to grant an interlocutory injunction. A person who employs a broker to sell shares on the Stock Exchange is bound to indemnify the broker for any liability he may incur in consequence of carrying out his principal's instructions under any rules of the Stock Exchange, provided that such rules are reasonable.

A rule providing that the seller of shares is responsible for the genuineness and regularity of all documents delivered, and for such dividends as may be received until reasonable time has been allowed to the transferee to execute and duly lodge such documents for verification and registration, and that, when an official certificate of registration of such shares or stock has been issued, the committee of the Stock Exchange will not (unless bad faith is alleged against the seller) take cognisance of any subsequent dispute as to title, until the legal issue has been decided, held to be a reasonable rule. A Application by the defendant for judgment or a new trial, on appeal from the verdict and judgment given at the trial before DENMAN, J., with a jury.

In 1879 the defendant, a dealer in stocks and shares in London, but not a member of the London Stock Exchange, employed the plaintiff, a stockbroker and a member of the London Stock Exchange, to sell £1,250 London and North-Western Railway 4 per cent. preference stock subject to the rules of the Stock Exchange.

B Rule 92 of those rules provided :

C "The seller of shares or stock is responsible for the genuineness and regularity of all documents delivered, and for such dividends as may be received, until reasonable time has been allowed to the transferee to execute and duly lodge such documents for verification and registration. When an official certificate of registration of such shares or stock has been issued, the committee will not (unless bad faith is alleged against the seller) take cognisance of any subsequent dispute as to title, until the legal issue has been decided, the reasonable expenses of which legal proceedings shall be borne by the seller."

The plaintiff sold £922 of that stock to Brunton, Bourke & Co., inside brokers, who were acting for Lord Hillingdon. Transfers purporting to be executed by

D Thomas and Ann Barton were sent by the defendant to the plaintiff and handed to Brunton, Bourke & Co., and the purchase money was paid to the defendant. In 1887 litigation arose when it was discovered that the signature of Ann Barton on the transfers had been forged by Thomas Barton, who had instructed the defendant to sell, and in Barton v. London and North-Western Rail. Co. (24 Q.B.D. 77) the Court of Appeal ordered the railway company to replace Ann

E Barton's name on the register as holder of the stock. Lord Hillingdon was a third party in this action. The company then took Lord Hillingdon's name off the register, and on his application Brunton, Bourke & Co. obtained a resolution from the committee of the Stock Exchange that the plaintiff should make good the loss which Lord Hillingdon had suffered. The plaintiff acted in accordance with the resolution, and brought the present action against the defendant for an

F indemnity. DENMAN, J., held that the defendant was liable to indemnify the plaintiff, and the defendant moved for judgment or a new trial.

G Feb. 27, 1892. LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case an action has been brought by a member of the London Stock Exchange against an outside broker, that is to say, a broker who is not a member of the Stock Exchange. The defendant directed the plaintiff to sell certain shares, and the plaintiff carried out his instructions, but, says the plaintiff, the transfers being forged and he being obliged by the rules of the Stock Exchange to indemnify the purchasing broker, the defendant ought to indemnify him. The defendant chose to have the shares sold on the Stock Exchange. That is a well-known market and subject to rules, so that, if a stranger employs a broker to buy or sell in that market, he takes the consequences of what may happen by reason of the application of the rules, if the consequences are caused by his instructions, and are the result of carrying them out, provided

H that the rules are reasonable. That is a consequence of dealing in any market.

I In such a case the plaintiff will be entitled to recover against the defendant, not because the Stock Exchange can bind by its rules anyone who is not a member—that clearly cannot be so; but because the defendant is bound by virtue of the common law, if at all, for the reasons I have mentioned.

The first question, therefore, is, whether this r. 92 is a reasonable one. I am not prepared to say that it is not. If, then, it has been acted on so as to make the plaintiff liable under it, the defendant will be liable by the common law to indemnify him. But it is said that, though it may be reasonable, it has not been properly acted on or followed, and that the Stock Exchange never made the plaintiff A liable; in other words, that the committee acted beyond their powers. That question depends on the construction of the rule. It is a very difficult one to understand. The first part of the rule is clear enough: the selling broker is to be responsible for the genuineness and regularity of all documents delivered. But the rule goes on to provide that,

"when an official certificate of registration of such shares or stock has been B issued the committee will not (unless bad faith is alleged against the seller) take cognisance of any subsequent dispute as to title until the legal issue has been decided."

It is not said between whom the legal issue is to be. Is it between the two brokers? C
If so, no legal issue has been decided here, and, therefore, a condition upon which the committee has power to act has not been fulfilled. If so, the Stock Exchange, by its own rules, had no power to take cognisance of the dispute. Grammatically, the legal issue would mean one between the two brokers; but, looking at the other rules, I think that the strict grammatical meaning is not to be taken, and "the D legal issue" must mean one decided between the real principals to the transaction, that is to say, the persons for whom the shares were sold and bought, who in this case were the defendant and Lord Hillingdon. Whether "decided" means by trial or by admission between them it is not necessary to consider now, as the condition has clearly been fulfilled. Therefore, the committee had jurisdiction to settle the matter in dispute between the two members of the Stock Exchange, and, as I have said already, the defendant is liable by the common law to indemnify his agent. The decision of DENMAN, J., was right, and this appeal must be dismissed. E

FRY, L.J.—The plaintiff, a member of the Stock Exchange, is suing his principal in a transaction on the Stock Exchange for an indemnity which he claims in respect of the liability which he has incurred under a resolution of the committee of the Stock Exchange, made in accordance with the rules of the Stock Exchange.
The defendant says that the resolution was not properly made under the rule F which it professes to have been made under, and he also says that the rule is unreasonable and was not known to him, and therefore that it is not binding on him. The first point is, whether the resolution passed by the committee was within the power conferred on the committee by the rules of the Stock Exchange.

The rules provide for the appointment of a committee, and give it supervision G over all transactions which take place on the Stock Exchange. The decisions of the committee are to be final, and the sanction by which their decisions can be enforced is the expulsion of a member who disregards them. The rule under which the committee purported to act in this case is r. 92. It is obvious that the latter sentence in that rule implies the existence of the liability which was asserted in the former sentence, but it puts fetters on the exercise of the jurisdiction which the words of the first sentence created; and it, therefore, implies that the first H sentence created a liability larger than what would at the first glance seem to be created. But on reading more closely we see that there is a third period of time referred to, namely, the period between the lapse of the reasonable time for lodging the documents for verification and registration and the time when the official certificate of registration has been issued. Supposing a dispute arises during that period, does the responsibility mentioned in the rule exist or not? It appears I to me that it would be unreasonable to say that the responsibility exists in the first and third periods of time but not in the intermediate period. I think that the responsibility is not limited in time, and I feel bound to hold that throughout the whole rule the existence of the responsibility of the seller is implied. I, therefore, think that the defendant is wrong in contending that there was no responsibility after the official certificate was issued.

When an official certificate has been issued, the rule provides that the committee will not (unless bad faith is alleged against the seller) take cognisance of any

- A subsequent dispute as to title, until the legal issue has been decided. The rule is obviously one to be invoked by the purchaser of shares, not the seller, and means that, in case of a dispute between two such members of the Stock Exchange, after the official certificate has been issued and if no question of bad faith is raised, the purchasing member is to have no remedy against the selling member until the legal issue between their principals has been decided. Then the rule applies a
- B decision between the principals to a dispute before the committee between members. By the last part of the rule it seems that if the purchaser succeeds at law against the seller, the selling member is liable to make good the expenses of litigation to the purchasing member's principal, but it is unnecessary now to decide that matter. The rule is a very crabbed piece of English and difficult to understand.
- C The second question is whether the rule is unreasonable. The defendant contends that it is, because the person who would be affected through the implied contract of indemnity in respect of it is not heard before the committee. I cannot agree with that view. When A. has agreed to indemnify B. against a claim by C., the claim is naturally fought out between B. and C.; but when B. makes his claim for indemnity against A., the latter may show, if he can, that B. has not
- D done his duty in defending properly the claim made against him by C. I see nothing unreasonable in the rule, and the judgment of DENMAN, J., must be affirmed.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree with the other members of the court in the construction they have put on the words of this rule, and I do not see anything unreasonable

E in such a rule.

The defendant appealed to the House of Lords, where the parties were represented by the same counsel as in the Court of Appeal.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—The sole question involved is whether the committee of the Stock Exchange acted within their jurisdiction in ordering the respondent to make this payment and incur this liability for the purpose of his discharging his obligation to Messrs. Brunton, Bourke & Co. It is immaterial whether the appellant was or was not acquainted with the terms of the particular rule of the Stock Exchange under which the committee acted, because he knew when he instructed the respondent to act for him that there were rules of the

F Stock Exchange under which the committee had power to settle disputes between

G members of the Stock Exchange, and that the respondent was a member of the Stock Exchange, and, therefore, was subject to those rules, unless it can be shown that those rules are unreasonable. The object of the rule in question is to insure as between members of the Stock Exchange that every document passing between them shall be genuine and regular. It was alleged on the part of the appellant

H that the committee had no jurisdiction because there was, at the time they passed the resolution, a dispute subsisting as to the title, and that the legal issue had not been decided, and that, therefore, under the rule itself the committee had no jurisdiction. I do not say that the rule was framed as perfectly as it might be because some matters were left to implication which it would have been better to express; but at the same time it appears to me that, as regards any question

I arising between the parties to this action, the construction of the rule appears to be plain and to be free from difficulty. It is evident that as soon as the legal issue between the parties interested, which does not necessarily mean the brokers only, has been decided the jurisdiction of the committee commences. It is said that the respondent may have obtained some title against the railway by estoppel, and that in that case he will not be damnified, and that, therefore, under the rule the committee has no jurisdiction until that legal issue has been decided. I, however, do not think that that will be a reasonable construction of the rule. The committee may make it a condition that the seller shall have the benefit of any claim which the purchaser may have against the company, but that question does not arise in the present case. A

I rest my judgment upon what appears to me to be the plain language of the rule. I think that in the present case the legal issue has been decided within the meaning of the rule, that the committee has power to take cognizance of the question, that they have acted within their jurisdiction, and that, therefore, the appellant has no answer to the claim of the respondent, which is founded upon their decision. I beg to move that the judgment of the court below be affirmed, and the appeal be dismissed, with costs. B

C Motion by Messrs. Barton and Pearman, the former solicitors of Ann Boden, the plaintiff, to discharge an order made in chambers that they should deliver up to the plaintiff's new solicitors documents necessary for the conduct of the action commenced by the plaintiff.

The action was brought by Ann Boden, widow, as sole plaintiff, against Ernest Hensby as sole defendant, on June 8, 1891, for a sale in lieu of partition of the real estate devised by the will of John Boden to his wife for life, and after her death to the plaintiff and his other children in equal shares. The statement of claim stated that the testator's widow died in 1883, and that the plaintiff and defendant were his only children. Messrs. Barton and Pearman acted as the plaintiff's solicitors in the action, and had also acted as her solicitors in other matters, including an action of Hensby v. Hensby for the administration of John Boden's estate, in which the interests of the plaintiff and defendant had been declared by the chief clerk's certificate, dated Feb. 10, 1877, which also described the property subject to the trusts of the will. On July 25, 1891, an order was made in the action of Boden v. Hensby, on the motion of the plaintiff, for an inquiry "who are the persons interested in or entitled to the property referred to in the statement of claim and described in the chief clerk's certificate in the said action of Hensby v. Hensby, and in what shares and proportions such persons are so interested or entitled, and whether such persons are parties to this action or have been served with notice of this motion," and the court not requiring any further trial of the action, further consideration was adjourned. The plaintiff resided in New South Wales, and Messrs. Barton and Pearman had acted upon the retainer of A. W. Clarke, her attorney in England. By a deed-poll, dated Aug. 26, 1891, the plaintiff revoked the power of attorney she had given to A. W. Clarke, and appointed Messrs. P. J. Gordon & Sons her attorneys in his place. On Nov. 6, 1891, Messrs. P. J. Gordon & Sons gave notice to Messrs. Barton and Pearman that they had been instructed to act as the plaintiff's solicitors in the action of Boden v. Hensby, and on the same day they filed a notice of the change of solicitors. On Nov. 30, 1891, Messrs. P. J. Gordon & Sons took out a summons asking that Messrs. Barton and Pearman might be ordered to deliver up to them such deeds, papers, and writings in their custody and power as might be necessary for the conduct of the action, and that the question of necessity for the production of the same in case of difference might be settled by the judge in chambers. On Dec. 10, 1891, an order was made in chambers in the terms of this summons. The former solicitors now moved to discharge this order.

H. B. Howard for the motion.

Serrell for the plaintiff.

I NORTH, J.—I think there is a distinction in this case between the documents which came into the possession of the applicants before and independently of this action, and those which came into their possession since its commencement, or for the purpose of carrying it on.

The chief clerk has followed the order in Re Boughton (1). It is argued that that was an administration action, and the order asked for ought not to be made in any other action. But it is not restricted to administration actions. The rule does not merely apply to actions for the administration of the estate of a deceased person; it is applicable to an action for the administration of the trusts of a deed and to other proceedings of a representative character. In this case an inquiry has been ordered as to what persons are interested in the property. If it were as clear as counsel for the motion says it is that only the plaintiff and the defendant are interested, no inquiry would have been necessary. I agree that it is clear that only two persons were interested at the date at which the will came into operation, but other persons may have acquired an interest since. There has been a decree which might be proceeded with and worked out by the plaintiff or by the defendant, or upon a proper application by the encumbrancers of either. A

I think, therefore, that this is a case to which Boughton (1) applies. But Re Capital Fire Insurance Association (2) draws a distinction between documents which have come into the solicitors' possession since the commencement of the proceedings, or for the purposes of such proceedings, and those which were in their possession before and for other purposes, and decides that no order should be made as to the latter class. The order will be for the delivery up, on the terms laid down in Re Boughton (1), of all documents which have come into the possession of Messrs. Barton and Pearman since the commencement of this action, or for the purposes thereof. As to any documents which do not come within that description there will be no order. The order made in chambers was too wide, and, therefore, I make no order as to costs. B

An act of bankruptcy can only be committed by a "debtor" within the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, which means a debtor subject to English law and does not include a foreigner who is not in England and has not committed any act of bankruptcy in England, and so the court cannot grant leave to serve a bankruptcy notice abroad on such a person.

Appeal by J. F. Pearson from an order of Mr. Registrar GIFFORD refusing to set aside a bankruptcy notice served by the International Bank of London on him in America.

The debtor, J. F. Pearson, was an American, and resided at Buenos Aires, where he carried on the business of the firm of S. B. Hale & Co., of which he was a partner. He had at one time resided for a short period in England, but that was some time previous to the date of the transactions in respect of which the present bankruptcy proceedings were taken. An action was brought by the International Bank of London against the members of the debtor's firm in respect of an alleged debt, and leave was obtained for service out of the jurisdiction upon the debtor. In default of appearance, the plaintiffs signed judgment against him.

D Afterwards the bank obtained leave to serve him in Buenos Aires with a bankruptcy notice. The registrar having refused an application to set this notice aside, an appeal was now made to this court.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4 (1) (g), it is provided that a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in the following case :

E

"If a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him in England, or by leave of the court elsewhere, a bankruptcy notice under this Act requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment or to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor or the court, and he does not within seven days after service of the notice in case the service is effected in England, and in case the service is effected elsewhere, then within the time limited in that behalf by the order giving leave to effect the service, either comply with the requirements of the notice or satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross demand, which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained."

F*G

By s. 6 (1) (d) it is provided that :

"A creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless the debtor is domiciled in England, or within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition has ordinarily resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England."

H

Levett, Q.C., and Yate Lee for the debtor.

Bigham, Q.C., Herbert Reed and F. H. Mellor for the International Bank.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case an American, living in Buenos Aires, has been served there with a bankruptcy notice, and, as he has not complied with the demand in the notice, it is alleged that he has committed an act of bankruptcy, and is liable to have a receiving order made against him in England.

I

In this appeal it has been objected that the English court, which gave leave to serve this notice out of the jurisdiction, had no power to give leave in such a case as this with the object of making a foreigner residing abroad liable to English bankruptcy law. The question, therefore, for our consideration is, whether, under such circumstances, the English court had jurisdiction to give leave. The American certainly at one time carried on business in England, and it is said that he was once ordinarily residing in England; but it is admitted that he had not committed any act of bankruptcy in this country up to the time when leave was given to serve the bankruptcy notice upon him. The question is, therefore, whether a foreigner, who has not committed any act of bankruptcy in England, and who is not in England, can be served while he is abroad with a bankruptcy notice for the purpose of making him a bankrupt in England. A

Unless s. 6 of the old Bankruptcy Act of 1869 has been altered by the Act of 1883, which is at present in force, Re Sawers, Ex parte Blain (1) is direct authority that, under the terms of the old Act, such a notice as this could not be served on a foreigner abroad for the purpose of making him a bankrupt here unless he had committed an act of bankruptcy in this country. The reasons of that judgment were given by JAMES, L.J., and I shall not go through them again. But it is said that there are some new words in the present Bankruptcy Act, and that s. 6 has altered the effect of s. 4. If s. 4 stood alone, it seems to me that there are no words in it so clear as to show that the legislature meant to extend the jurisdiction of the court so as to affect a foreigner not residing in England. Therefore, taking s. 4 by itself, I am of opinion that the same construction is to be put upon it as upon s. 6 in the Act of 1869, and that Ex parte Blain (1) governs that construction. As to the effect of s. 6. Section 4 shows affirmatively what is necessary to constitute an act of bankruptcy, and s. 6 is a negative section; so that, unless a case is within s. 4, there is no need to consider s. 6. Taking the construction of s. 4 to be, as I have said, the same as that of s. 6 under the old Act, this person is not brought within it, because Ex parte Blain (1) decided that a foreigner domiciled and resident abroad cannot be made a bankrupt in England; therefore, leave to serve this bankruptcy notice ought not to have been given. Since the case is not within s. 4, it is immaterial to consider whether or not the debtor is within s. 6. B

It would be impossible to say that, because a foreigner might have been residing for a few years in England, the English Bankruptcy Court could several years afterwards give leave to serve upon him abroad a bankruptcy notice in order to make him subject to English bankruptcy law. The mere statement of such a proposition is enough to show that it cannot be maintained. I think the decision of the registrar was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed. E

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns principally on the construction of s. 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It has been argued that "debtor" there means only one who is subject to English law. That argument seems to me to be well founded, and I agree that this case is really concluded by the decision in Ex parte Blain (1), which turns not merely on the words of the Act, but also on the general principles of law. In that case JAMES, L.J., said (12 Ch.D. at p. 526): F

"It appears to me that the whole question is governed by the broad, general, universal principle that English legislation, unless the contrary is expressly enacted, or so plainly implied as to make it the duty of an English court to give effect to an English statute, is applicable only to English subjects, or to foreigners who by coming into this country, whether for a short or long time, have made themselves during that time subject to English jurisdiction." H

BRETT, L.J., adopted the same principle and said (ibid. at p. 528):

"The governing principle is that all legislation is prima facie territorial; that is to say, that the legislation of any country binds its own subjects and the 'subjects' of other countries who for the time bring themselves within the allegiance of the legislating power." I

Therefore, there is no doubt in my mind that s. 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, applies only to debtors who are subject to English law.

Is there anything in the statute raising a presumption that the legislature intended to extend the jurisdiction of the English court to foreigners not otherwise subject to English law? Our attention has been called to sub-s. (1) (g) of s. 4, which provides for the service by the creditor on the debtor of a bankruptcy notice in England, or by leave of the court elsewhere. But there is no difficulty in those

A words, because a debtor who is an English subject may be out of England, in which case the leave of the court is necessary before a bankruptcy notice can be served on him.

Then reliance is placed on s. 6, and we are asked to say that, in a case where the negative words of that section do not apply, then the court has jurisdiction. To draw such a conclusion would be monstrous. The negative words only mean
B that in some cases the bankruptcy law applies. We have to inquire whether there has been in this case an act of bankruptcy, and on that inquiry s. 6 throws no light at all.

I think s. 4 ought to be interpreted according to the general principles of law, and s. 6 shows no intention on the part of the legislature to extend the jurisdiction of the English bankruptcy court beyond what it was under the former Bankruptcy
C Act. I, therefore, think that this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The word "debtor" in s. 4 means a debtor who is subject to English law, and there is then no difficulty in deciding the case. It is really governed by Ex parte Blain (1), and I will refer especially to the judgment of COTTON, L.J. He said (12 Ch.D. at pp. 531, 532):

D "I take it the limitation is this, that all laws of the English Parliament must be territorial—territorial in this sense, that they apply to and bind all subjects of the Crown who come within the fair interpretation of them, and also all aliens who come to this country, and who, during the time they are here, do any act which, on a fair interpretation of the statute as regards them, comes within its provisions. Of course, it is not necessary that a person to be subject
E to an English Act should be domiciled here. If he is resident here temporarily, and does an act which comes within the intent and purview of a statute, he, as regards that statute, as does every alien who comes here in regard to all the laws of this realm, submits himself to the law, and must be dealt with accordingly. As regards an Englishman, a subject of the British Crown, it is
F not necessary that he should be here, if he has done that which the Act of Parliament says shall give jurisdiction, because he is bound by the Act by reason of his being a British subject; though, of course, in the case of a British subject not resident here, it may be a question on the construction of the Act of Parliament whether that which, if he had been resident here, would have brought him within the Act, has that effect when he is not resident here.
G As regards a British subject, whether he is here or not, he can be made bankrupt if the Act of Parliament has declared that, in the events which have happened, he can be made bankrupt. But, as regards foreigners, there is prima facie no right to bind them if they are not here."

Turning to sub-s. (1) (g), we find that to serve a bankruptcy notice elsewhere than in England the leave of the court must be obtained. In the present case the court
H has no jurisdiction to give leave, and, therefore, no act of bankruptcy has been committed by the debtor. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Kekewich, J.), July 1, 8, 1892]

[Reported [1892] 3 Ch. 132; 62 L.J.Ch. 74; 67 L.T. 190; 3 R. 23]

Trustee—Appointment—Appointment by court—Application by majority of beneficiaries—Person with power of appointment wishing to exercise it.

One of the persons beneficially interested in property subject to the trusts of a will applied to the court for the appointment of new trustees of the will. The legal personal representative of the last surviving trustee of the testator's will subsequently proved her testator's will, and, although she was not beneficially interested in the trust property, claimed to exercise the power of appointment of new trustees conferred by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 31. An order was made by the judge in chambers, with the concurrence of a majority of the persons beneficially interested in the trust estate, appointing new trustees. Upon motion to discharge this order,

Held: whether because the court had no jurisdiction or because it would not exercise it, it would not appoint new trustees where there was a subsisting statutory or other power of appointing new trustees, and the donee of the power was willing to exercise it; and accordingly, the order made in chambers should be discharged.

Notes. The Trustee Act, 1852, s. 9, has been repealed and is now replaced by the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 41. The Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 31 (1), has been repealed and is now replaced by the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 36 (1).

Motion by Mary Jane Broadbent, the legal personal representative of the last surviving executor of the will of Joseph Higginbottom, and by two beneficiaries under the said will, to discharge an order made in chambers upon the application of the majority of the beneficiaries under the said will appointing certain persons to be trustees thereof.

Edward Lees died on Dec. 1, 1842, and John Higginbottom died on Jan. 16, 1853. By his will, dated Jan. 15, 1853, John Higginbottom appointed his wife Sarah Higginbottom the sole executrix thereof, and devised to her all his trust estates. Sarah Higginbottom died on Mar. 18, 1885, having by her will, dated Mar. 16, 1885, appointed Mary Jane Broadbent the sole executrix thereof, and devised her trust estates to the said M. J. Broadbent. On May 2, 1892, M. J. Broadbent proved the will of the said Sarah Higginbottom.

- A On Feb. 23, 1892, an originating summons, intituled in the matter of the trusts of the will of Joseph Higginbottom, deceased, and in the matter of the Trustee Acts, 1850 and 1852, was taken out by one of the persons beneficially entitled under the trusts of the said will, for the appointment of certain persons as trustees of the said will, and for the vesting of the real estate in such trustees, and, on May 20, 1892, an order was made by the judge in chambers accordingly, with the concurrence of beneficiaries entitled in all to about five-sixths of the trust estate.

This was a motion on behalf of Mary Jane Broadbent and two of the remaining beneficiaries that the order of May 20, 1892, might be discharged. Mary Jane Broadbent was not herself beneficially entitled to any part of the trust estate.

By the Trustee Act, 1852, s. 9 :

- C “That in all cases where it shall be expedient to appoint a new Trustee, and it shall be found inexpedient, difficult or impracticable so to do without the assistance of the Court of Chancery, it shall be lawful for the said court to make an Order appointing a new Trustee or new Trustees, whether there be any existing Trustee or not at the time of making such Order.”

By the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 31 (1) :

- D “Where a trustee, either original or substituted, and whether appointed by a court or otherwise, is dead, or remains out of the United Kingdom for more than twelve months, or desires to be discharged from the trusts or powers reposed in or conferred on him, or refuses or is unfit to act therein, or is incapable of acting therein, then the person or persons nominated for this purpose by the instrument, if any, creating the trust, or if there is no such person, or no such person able and willing to act, then the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee for the time being, or the personal representatives of the last surviving or continuing trustee, may, by writing, appoint another person or other persons to be a trustee or trustees in place of the trustee dead, remaining out of the United Kingdom, desiring to be discharged, refusing or being unfit, or being incapable as aforesaid.”

- F A. G. Roby for the applicant, Mary Jane Broadbent.
J. Roskill for the applicants upon the summons.

- G July 8, 1892. KEKEWICH, J.—Mary Jane Broadbent, the legal personal representative of the last surviving executor of the testator's will, insists that, she being willing to exercise such powers as are vested in her by statute or otherwise, including that of appointing new trustees, no order for the appointment of new trustees can properly be made by the court. The question was argued as one of jurisdiction, and probably that is the proper view of the question which has to be decided. It is immaterial, however, whether the court has no jurisdiction, or, having it, declines to exercise it; and my judgment proceeds upon grounds equally applicable to either position.

- H The non-interference with the legal power of appointment of new trustees is established by several cases. Re Gadd (1) is now generally quoted, but I take the principle to be stated clearly in Tempest v. Lord Camoys (2), Re Gadd (1) only adapting that principle to the particular case. The same principle is seen in I Re Hodson's Settlement (3), as to which I have a note that in Re Soldby (4) the Master of the Rolls (probably LORD ROMILLY) followed it when the legal bar was given by Lord Campbell's Act (Fatal Accidents Act, 1846). The remarks of KAY, J., in Re Gibbon's Trusts (5) which was a consent petition, do not militate against this, the facts and the arguments to which they were addressed being of an entirely different character.

There are many points for consideration in this particular case before me, such as the devolution of the legal estate, and the construction as regards the beneficial interest, which may be passed over now with the single observation that they present difficulties sufficient to make one pause, and I will deal only with the one question I have already noticed. No objection has been taken to either of the trustees proposed by the applicants. They have been selected by a number of persons who are largely interested in the estate, and to whose voice weight ought to be given. Mary Jane Broadbent is not herself a beneficiary, and probably her zeal is due to the influence of others rather than to any honest desire on her own part to act as trustee. In any further proceedings in this matter—and I apprehend that further proceedings are probable—the influence to which I have alluded will require to be carefully watched. It will be the duty of any judge before whom the matter comes to take such care as his power enables him to do that the zeal to which I have referred does not cast more than a proper proportion of costs on this small estate. She can, however, in my opinion use her legal bar to prevent an advantageous appointment of new trustees, and to that extent, at any rate, increase the cost of administering the estate.

Therefore, now that I have had an opportunity of fully considering it, the order made at chambers, the pronouncement of which was, I think, dictated rather by an earnest desire to do what was the best for all concerned than by strict adherence to legal results, must be discharged. In discharging it I have no power whatever to order any costs to be paid out of the estate. I might, of course, order the applicants to pay the costs, either here or in chambers, or on both occasions, but I think that would be extremely unfair to them. They have brought forward two unobjectionable trustees, approved, as I have already mentioned, by a large number of beneficiaries, and, when they originally made the application, Mary Jane Broadbent had not completed her legal title, and was not in a position to raise the legal objections which she has now raised. Therefore, it would be wrong, in my judgment, to order these applicants to pay any costs, though unfortunately I must leave them to bear their own.

I cannot deal with Mary Jane Broadbent's costs now. I do not say that she will not be entitled to them at any future time. The order intended to be made in chambers was that the costs should not be dealt with by that order. Unfortunately, I think, a form, which I am told is a new one—it is certainly new to me—was adopted and raised a question whether the order did not in terms say that she was not to be allowed any costs. That was distinctly adverse to my own express view in chambers. In now giving no costs I wish it to be understood that I do so in the ordinary form. I make no order respecting the costs of the application; that decides nothing about them whatever. The order, therefore, will simply be that the order made in chambers be discharged.

Re LORD GERARD'S SETTLED ESTATE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Lopes and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.), July 17, 18, 1893]

Settled Land—Improvement—Application of capital money—Matters of amenity and luxury—Structural alterations and additions to mansion house—Residence for agent—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict., c. 38), s. 21, s. 25—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict., c. 69), s. 13.

By a scheme submitted by the tenant for life to the trustees of a settled estate which had recently been purchased for £198,000, it was proposed—(i) to build two towers at the north-east and south-east angles of the mansion-house, to match those standing at the corresponding angles; (ii) to build a new vestibule with a portico in keeping with the style of the building; (iii) to build an addition to the east wing to correspond with that of the west wing; (iv) to face the north front of the house with stone and to introduce mullioned windows; (v) to build a chapel for Roman Catholic services; (vi) to renew the stone copings and finials of the west wing; (vii) to build new stables, the existing stables being unsuitable and wholly insufficient for the requirements of the mansion; (viii) to build a small house for the residence of the estate agent, there being no proper accommodation for the agent on the property. There was an additional scheme for putting a new roof on the house. The total cost of these proposed improvements was estimated at £18,250. The question was whether this sum was to be personally paid by the tenant for life, or whether the court had power, under the Settled Land Acts, to authorise the payment to be made out of capital money subject to the settlement. The tenant for life was expending upon other improvements a further sum of over £34,000 out of his own moneys. The trustees were willing to accede to the wishes of the tenant for life if the court should be of opinion that they could do so consistently with their duty.

Held: as regards items (i) to (vi) inclusive, the Settled Land Acts, 1882 and 1890, did not authorise the application of capital money to matters of mere amenity or luxury, such as the indulgence of architectural taste and as regards items (vii) and (viii) the proposals did not fall within any category of improvements authorised by those Acts; and, therefore, the court could not sanction the application of capital money for any of the proposed improvements.

Appeal by the tenant for life of settled land from an order of CHITTY, J., dated June 1, 1893.

An originating summons was taken out on behalf of the Right Hon. William Cansfield Baron Gerard, the tenant for life in possession of the Garswood estates, situate in the county of Lancaster, and the Eastwell Park estate, situate in the county of Kent (respectively settled by or by reference to a settlement made by an indenture dated Mar. 24, 1875), against Frederick Gerard and Sir John Lawson, the trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of that settlement. The summons asked that it might be declared that all the improvements and works specified in the two schemes, dated respectively Feb. 16, 1893, and April 17, 1893, submitted by the applicant to the trustees of the settlement for their approval, and proposed to be executed to and on the Eastwell Park Estate, were respectively improvements authorised by the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890; and alternatively that it might be ascertained and declared which of the improvements and works specified in the schemes were improvements authorised by the Settled Land Acts. The estimated total cost of the proposed improvements amounted to £18,250. D

The summons was adjourned into court, and came on to be heard before CHITTY, J., who held that none of the proposed improvements were such as the Acts authorised to be paid out of capital money. E

Byrne, Q.C., and Upjohn for the tenant for life.
T. C. Wright for the trustees. F

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of CHITTY, J., made on the application of the tenant for life of certain settled estates. The trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts desire to have the opinion of the court. The summons taken out by the tenant for life asks for a declaration that all the improvements and works specified in two schemes mentioned in the summons submitted by the applicant to the trustees of the settlement for their approval, and proposed to be executed to and on the Eastwell Park Estate are respectively improvements authorised by the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890. Alternatively it asks that it may be ascertained and declared which of the improvements and works specified in the schemes are improvements authorised by the Settled Land Acts. CHITTY, J., has made an order in these terms: G

"This court being of opinion that none of the improvements and works specified in the said two schemes are improvements authorised by the Settled Land Acts, or which ought to be paid for out of capital moneys doth order that the said summons do stand dismissed and that the respondents, the trustees, take their costs." H

The appeal from that order is brought before us, and we are asked to say that if all the improvements and alterations suggested are not within the Settled Land Acts at all events some of them are. I

- A In order to deal with that we must look and see, of course, what the schemes are. [His LORDSHIP read and commented on the schemes, and continued:] The first question that arises is on the true construction of the Settled Land Acts, and I proceed at once with the construction contended for on behalf of the tenant for life, which lies at the root of nine-tenths of this case. The argument is that the decisions on the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, of which Drake v. Trefusis (3) may be taken as a type, are decisions to be applied to the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 2 (vii).
- B The Settled Land Act, 1882, including the Acts which have been since passed to amend it, notably the Act of 1890, forms a code applicable to the subject-matter with which those Acts deal. Looking at the scheme of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and especially at s. 21 and s. 25, it appears to me that it would be a distinct mistake to apply to s. 21 (vii), the construction which has been placed on similar words in another Act of Parliament having totally different objects. Section 21 of the Act of 1882 enacts as follows: [His LORDSHIP read the section, and continued:] Then we come to a series of modes, including investment in government securities, the discharge, purchase, or redemption of incumbrances, improvements authorised by this Act (which refers us to s. 25 and s. 26), payment for equality of exchange, purchase of the seignory, and purchase of the reversion. Then comes sub-s. (vii), "In purchase of land in fee simple," and so on. Then sub-s. (viii) empowers the purchase either in fee simple or for a term of sixty years or more, of mines and minerals. Sub-s. (ix) relates to the payment to any person becoming absolutely entitled. Sub-section (x) relates to the payment of costs, and sub-s. (xi) authorises capital money to be applied in any other mode in which money produced by the exercise of a power in the settlement is applicable thereunder.
- E That is an enumeration of the purposes for which capital money may be applied, and having regard to that enumeration and to the enlargement of it in s. 25 and s. 26 I cannot construe s. 21 (vii) as including matters which the court has held may be included under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. We are not dealing with the Lands Clauses Act. It has nothing to do with the present case whatever; and it is not a code addressed to the same subject-matter as the Settled Land Acts.
- F Although the court has seen its way under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, to allow money paid into court under that Act, and taken under a special Act of Parliament to be employed in erecting buildings, but not in improvements, it appears to me that to hold that that line of cases is to be incorporated into s. 21 (vii) is inconsistent with what is enacted in s. 25. If that line of cases is to be so applied there would be no use whatever in having enumerated in s. 25 such objects as building cottages for labourers, farmhouses, saw mills, and other things of that kind.
- G One must treat it as a whole and not bring into this Act of Parliament authorities on other Acts of Parliament passed for different purposes altogether.
- That lies at the root of this case, and it throws us on the Settled Land Act, 1882, itself. Looking at the Settled Land Act itself, we must see which of these improvements or alterations are authorised by the Act and not by cases on other Acts.
- H Without going through them at any length, I may at once dispose of them by heads. First of all take the mansion-house. With regard to the mansion-house it strikes me that the present owner has an ugly house—I dare say it is—and he wants to get a handsome house. It is a natural thing for him to do so. But when he is seeking to do it out of money which is not his own, he must show the authority for so doing it. We are driven, therefore, naturally and necessarily
- I on the sections in the various Settled Land Acts, and when we come to examine those sections, we cannot find anything which goes the length of authorising the expenditure of capital money simply in beautifying an ugly house. It is not to be found there, and we cannot authorise it to be done. That disposes of a good many of the items.

The same observation really applies with respect to the chapel. There is nothing which authorises us to allow the expenditure of capital money in the erection of that chapel, and if the tenant for life wants a chapel he must pay for it himself.

Coming now to the agent's house, precisely the same observations apply. As regards the agent's house we have been referred to the authority of Re Houghton Estate (1) where BACON, V.-C., thought he might authorise such an expenditure. I rather gather from the argument addressed to the Vice-Chancellor by Mr. Marten that the agent's house there was a farmhouse in which the agent lived, because Mr. Marten put it that it might come under s. 25 (i), viz: "Farmhouses, offices, and outbuildings and other buildings for farm purposes." The Vice-Chancellor seems to have thought so too. Of course if that were so—if the agent's house there was a farmhouse in which the agent was living—there is no difficulty about it. But if the agent's house in that case was what the agent's house in this case is to be—if the Vice-Chancellor meant to go that length—then I cannot say that that case is in conformity with the Act of Parliament. I cannot find that it is. The building of a new agent's house is not within any of the subsections of the Act which is before us.

That disposes of a good deal of this application, but there remains the question of the stables. The argument as to the stables is extremely ingenious. There is nothing about stables in the Act of Parliament. If it is to be got in at all, it must be got in under such general words as buildings, outbuildings, or something of that kind. It is said that this sum of £6,500 for new stables can be authorised not so much under the Act of 1882—there seems to be confessedly a difficulty in getting it under that Act—but under the enlarged section s. 13 of the Settled Land Act, 1890. Section 13 of the Act of 1890 undoubtedly enlarges s. 25 of the Act of 1882, and it adds certain things which may be authorised, viz.,

"(i) Bridges; (ii) Making any additions to or alterations in buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let."

I think that might justify the expenditure of capital moneys in additions or alterations in stables, if such additions or alterations were reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let. But then I also agree with the view which has been taken by the courts of first instance in other cases than this, viz., that where there is no question of letting, one cannot spend capital moneys for such purposes. Lord Gerard is not going to let this property. He is going to inhabit it himself. I cannot differ from the construction put on that s. 13 (ii) in Re De Teissier's Settled Estates (2) by CHITTY, J., in which he says in effect ([1893] 1 Ch. at p. 159):

"You talk to me about authorising capital moneys to be spent in addition to or in the alterations of buildings which are reasonably necessary for the purpose of enabling the mansion to be let. You must show me that there is some probability of letting the place or some desire to let it. Until you do that, you cannot enforce that section."

I think that is a perfectly right and proper construction to be placed on that particular clause. Then s. 13 (iii) of the Act of 1890 relates to the erection of buildings in substitution for buildings within an urban sanitary district. I need not refer more fully to that provision, for it is inapplicable. Then comes s. 13 (iv) which provides:

"The re-building of the principal mansion-house on the settled land: Provided that the sum to be applied under this subsection shall not exceed one-half of the annual rental of the settled land."

It is argued that, although nothing is said about stables in the Act, the stables are part of the principal mansion-house, and, therefore, the court may authorise the spending of anything up to the statutory limit in re-building the stables.

Whether stables can or cannot be regarded as part of the principal mansion-house is a question of fact in each particular case. In some cases I think they might be. In some cases, I am clear that they could not. It depends on where the stables are, and what they are for. All stables could not be regarded as part of the principal mansion-house. On the other hand, the stables may be so connected

- A with the principal mansion-house— not merely physically, but by occupation, enjoyment, and propinquity—as to fall within the expression “re-building the principal mansion-house.” In this particular case, it may be that the old stables were so used for the purposes of the mansion-house and so near it that they must be fairly regarded as part of the principal mansion-house. But what is the scope of s. 13 (iv)? It applies to the re-building of the principal mansion-house. Could
- B one justify the expenditure of capital moneys in re-building the principal mansion which is pulled down simply because it is ugly and is to be re-built to suit the tenant for life? I do not think that at all. That is really the case with regard to these stables. These stables were old stables. They were very good except that they wanted better ventilation and better draining. They were not out of repair. They were not destroyed; but the tenant for life wanted to make a magnificent
- C house, and did not want to have ugly stables; and this necessity for pulling down these stables is a piece of artistic fancy.

I cannot bring myself to hold that there is a re-building of the principal mansion-house within the true meaning of this subsection. Even assuming that if these stables had been burnt, and had been in a ruinous condition, capital moneys might have been spent on re-building them within s. 13 (iv). I am not prepared to hold

D that it would be right for us to sanction this outlay on stables with which there is no real fault to be found except that they are old-fashioned and ugly. It seems to me, therefore, that the view that has been taken by CHITTY, J., is correct. The point about the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, I felt was important, and, therefore, I have dealt with the case at some length. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

- E LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the point that has been made in respect to the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, I think the answer to that point is a simple one. It is this, that the application which we are now dealing with is an application under the Settled Land Acts and not under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. Therefore, it seems to me that the authorities which have been cited to us having reference to the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, have no application
- F to the present case.

The Settled Lands Acts, 1882 and 1890, contain a most complete and exhaustive code of the different matters in respect of which capital money may be applied for improvements. That code is most specific. It is as particularly and carefully drawn as any code for such a purpose could well be. Speaking generally of that code I think that all the improvements authorised under the code (I mean that code contained in those two Acts in respect of improvements) were intended by the legislature to be improvements which were calculated to render the settled land more remunerative. I think that the legislature considered that the capital money under this Act was to be employed only in improvements calculated to increase or calculated to maintain the income of the settled land. The more carefully that code is examined the more clear it will be that such was the intention of the

G legislature. I do not think that the legislature intended that the capital money was to be employed in respect of matters which I will describe as mere amenities— matters which really are matters of mere luxury. I do not think, for instance, that capital money can be authorised to be expended in the indulgence of architectural taste. Many of the things in this case really may be summarised under matters involving architectural taste.

- I If I am correct in that view, that disposes of several of the things in respect of which capital money ought to be applied here. It disposes for instance of the chapel. It disposes of the towers. It disposes of the wings. It disposes of the vestibule. To my mind these are all matters of architectural taste or architectural amenity. However, there are two other matters which cannot be so easily brought under that head. The two matters I refer to are the agent's house and the stables. With regard to the agent's house, one asks oneself this question: Is that an improvement which is authorised by that code? I look carefully through the code contained in s. 25 of the Act of 1882, and then to the supplemental code contained in the Act of 1890, s. 13. I can find no words in either of those sections which would include the agent's house. An endeavour is made to bring the agent's house within s. 25 (x) of the Act of 1882. I quite feel that, if the agent's house can be brought under any words, it is under the words contained in that provision. The words are, "cottages for labourers, farm servants, and artisans employed on the settled land or not." Certainly, an agent is not a labourer; nor is he a farm servant; nor is he an artisan. I think, therefore, that he is clearly excluded from that subsection. But then I am met with the decision in Re Houghton Estate (1), which has been referred to. It was a judgment of BACON, V.-C. At first sight I was much impressed by that case. But I think the case, when carefully examined, may be explained in the way in which LINDLEY, L.J., has explained it, viz., that the house there was a farmhouse. Of course, if that is correct, it would then come under s. 25 (xi), "Farmhouses, offices, and outbuildings and other buildings for farm purposes." There would be no difficulty in bringing that within the code. But I am not at all clear myself, after reading the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, whether he is not, if I may respectfully say so, somewhat confused between the position of an agent and the position of a farm-bailiff. If he thought the agent's house in question was the house of a farm-bailiff, then I think it might be brought within the term "farm servants" contained in s. 25 (x). But an agent, to my mind, is a very different person from that; and when you look at the house, which it is sought to have built in this case for the agent, the description of the house itself leads one to the conclusion that a farm bailiff is not intended, but some very superior person. I find that the house is to contain two sitting-rooms, five bedrooms, and a bathroom. I do not think, in all probability, that one would supply a bathroom for a farm bailiff. My view, therefore, of that case is that either the learned Vice-Chancellor thought he was dealing with that which was practically a farmhouse or otherwise that the person for whom that house was intended was not so much in the character of an agent—such as the person would be whom Lord Gerrard would appoint—but rather in the character of a farm bailiff. However, I cannot think for one moment that the agent's house in the present case can be brought in any way within the code contained in either of these Acts of Parliament.

The stables stand on an entirely different footing. It is perfectly clear to my mind that the stables cannot in any possibility be brought within any of the terms or the words contained in s. 25 of the Act of 1882. I do not think it is pretended that they can. But then recourse was had to the supplemental code contained in the Act of 1890, s. 13, and an endeavour was made to bring it within s. 13 (ii). "Making any additions to or alterations in buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let." It is clear to my mind that that will not do. In Re De Teissier's Settled Estates (2) CHITTY, J., held that the meaning of that section was that the property in question must at the time be in contemplation to be let. The words he used were these ([1893] 1 Ch. at p. 156):

"This is not the kind of case that subsection was intended to provide for. It often happens that trustees have on their hands an old house which they come and tell me they cannot let because it has no billiard-room, or is without certain conveniences which all tenants, according to modern ideas, would insist upon. Additions and alterations such as these I usually consider proper, and allow under this sub-s. (ii), but before this section can apply there must be an actual letting in contemplation. In the present case the tenant for life proposes to occupy the house and some of the proposed repairs and alterations are already done, and the money spent."

All those latter words in that sentence apply to the case here. In this case the tenant for life intends to occupy the house and stables himself, and here too, as I understand, a very large portion of these alterations have been already made, and the money expended on them.

Therefore, according to my view, the stables cannot be brought within s. 13 (ii)

A of the Act of 1890. Then counsel for the tenant for life says that he brings it in under s. 13 (iv) of the Act of 1890. The words there are these, "The re-building of the principal mansion-house on the settled land." Several points arise under those words, which it is not necessary according to my view to decide in this case. It may be, and probably would be, that stables in certain cases would be held to be part of the principal mansion-house, when they are near the house, and I suppose practically amount to a necessary adjunct to the house. On the other hand there may be hunting stables at some distance off, which I think would not be held to be part of the principal mansion-house. I am inclined to concur in what has already been said in that respect, that as to whether the stables are part or not part of the principal mansion-house must in each case depend on the particular circumstances. The words on which I rely are these, "The re-building of the principal mansion-house on the settled land." I ask myself this question: "Is this a re-building?" and I say distinctly "It is not." What was the state of things before Lord Gerard pulled down these stables, as no doubt he was entitled to do, being a tenant for life without impeachment of waste. It is not suggested that they were not in excellent repair. It is said that they were old, that they were primitive, that they were unsuitable, and may be more or less uncomfortable. It is also alleged that they were not so well drained as they should be, and not so well ventilated as they should be. But the structure, as I understand was good and substantial. Even assuming that in this case they may be held to be part of the principal mansion-house, I cannot for one moment think that the legislature ever intended that simply and solely because old stables that were in good and substantial repair did not altogether suit the requirements and fancies of any particular tenant for life, on that account a pulling down and re-building was to be authorised by these Acts. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that neither the agent's house nor the stables are matters in respect of which those provisions of those Acts to which I have referred ought to be applied.

F There is only one other observation that I desire to make, and it was made by CHITTY, J., that is with regard to s. 53 of the Act of 1882. The section is familiar, but I had better first call attention to the terms of it, because I think it is not immaterial.

"A tenant for life shall in exercising any power under this Act have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and shall in relation to the exercise thereof by him be deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for those parties."

G As I understand the authorities, the interpretation to be put on that section is this, that while it does not impose on the tenant for life the rights of a trustee, it does more or less impose on him the responsibilities of a trustee. If that is so, what I ask myself is this: If the capital money which is sought in this case to be applied for the purposes which have been brought to our notice were so applied, might it not be justly said that it would be a breach of trust on the part of the trustee if he so applied trust money? On the whole, I am clearly of opinion that the judgment of CHITTY, J., was right.

I A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In this case Lord Gerard has within a recent period purchased Eastwell Park, for which he paid £198,000, borrowing the principal part of the money on mortgage. He found a house, which, although old, was a house which the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh and their family had taken on lease and resided in for five or six years. It is not suggested that since the Duke left, the house has been burnt, or that it had come into any great dilapidation. But Lord Gerard, having bought this house for his own whim and fancy, thought fit to improve and modernise it, and commenced by laying out for that purpose on this house an amount which is stated to be more than £34,000; but the amount is not material. He now comes to this court to be allowed to apply capital moneys which are in settlement to carry out these operations to the amount of £18,000 odd. The question is, whether for these purposes, and under these circumstances, this court should allow what he asks for. A

In the first place, I wish to state that my own opinion is that it is not the right way to construe an Act of Parliament passed in 1882 for a specific purpose, and which constitutes a code by itself, to go back to another Act which was passed nearly forty years before for another purpose altogether, viz., the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. I am myself quite willing to leave cases which have been decided on the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act to themselves, with this remark, that it does seem to me that BACON, V.-C., in Re Houghton Estate (1) went to the extreme limit when he held that under the Act a person was entitled to employ capital moneys to build a new house. That is all I wish to say. The way in which the Vice-Chancellor arrived at it was this: He said: B

"He may buy land; he may buy land, therefore, with a house on it: and therefore, he may build a new house on it himself." C

I do not say that that is wrong. All I say is that that was going to the extreme verge. That, however, is what the learned judge did. But that does not apply to the present case.

Undoubtedly, as has been pointed out by LINDLEY, L.J., under s. 21 (vii) and (viii) of the Act of 1882 investments may be made of capital moneys in the purchase of land and in the purchase of mines and minerals. But that, in my opinion—particularly taking into consideration the subsequent legislation—does not authorise the investment of that money in building houses unless they are specifically mentioned as two classes of houses are mentioned in s. 25 of that Act to which I will now turn. D

Section 25, as it seems to me, deals with the improvements and protection of the estate. I need not go through the whole of the subsections—twenty in number—but they are all for the improvement, and it seems to me might be said to be for the protection and improvement of the estate. They could in one way be protecting it, for they embrace matters which certainly would benefit the estate if moneys were about to be laid out. E

I come to s. 25 (xi), and I will deal with Re Houghton Estates (1), in which BACON, V.-C., decided that within this s. 25 is to be found authority to build an agent's house with capital moneys. On whatever basis it was that the learned Vice-Chancellor decided that case I cannot myself see that an agent's house comes within this section. All s. 25 (x) deals with is "Cottages for labourers, farm servants, and artisans employed on the settled land or not." That does not include an agent's house. The cottages are limited to the purposes for which they are to be built. Then s. 25 (xi) is "Farm houses, offices, and outbuildings and other buildings for farm purposes." That does not include an agent's house. And there is no other provision in s. 25 which deals at all with the building of either cottages or farmhouses, or houses of any kind; therefore, I think that the agent's house which is now asked for (money being asked to the amount of between £700 and £800 to build it) does not come within s. 25. F

I now pass on to the later Act, namely, the Settled Land Act, 1890. It is said, I understand, that s. 13 (ii) would apply to the agent's house if it applied at all. To what does s. 25 (ii) relate? Only "making any additions to or alterations in buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let." That would not apply to the agent's house at all. It would only apply to the question of stables. But before I come to that, I wish to read what is said about the stables in the scheme. It is said that the block of stable offices is of the same date as the original mansion, and is in a very uncomfortable and unsuitable condition and wholly insufficient for the requirements of the mansion. I dare say that that may be so after the mansion has been embellished and modernised as it is being embellished and modernised by Lord Gerard at the present time. Then it is said that the plan of the stable and fittings is of the most primitive description; that the ceilings are low and the drainage and ventilation very defective; and that G H I

- A it would be only a waste of money to attempt to do anything to the existing structure as no reasonable expenditure would ever make it suitable for the mansion. That is the governing phrase in the scheme. The cost, the scheme goes on to say, would be almost as much as that of re-building, and the result would not be satisfactory; and that it is, therefore, proposed to build a new stable. Now I come to this: Is the pulling down and re-building of a stable on a new site and
- B on an enlarged area for the purpose of modernising the stable a re-building of a principal mansion-house? That is the question which I have got to answer. It takes some steps to get to that. I repeat it, is the pulling down and re-building of a stable on a new site, with a different elevation and more magnificent, as is pointed out by CHITTY, J., a re-building of a principal mansion-house within s. 13 (ii)? I will just make one further remark on s. 13 (ii) simply to say that I agree
- C with what has fallen from CHITTY, J., and LINDLEY and LOPES, L.J.J., and that is, that s. 13 (ii) clearly to my mind only sanctions the making of any additions to or alterations in buildings. I will read three words into s. 13 (ii) to make my view of it abundantly clear. Those words are: "Which may be," so that the provision reads thus: "... Which may be reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let." One must read those words in as if they were comprised in the provision as it is; and, unless there is a present intention for a letting which does not exist in this case, s. 13 (ii) does not apply.

- I come now to s. 13 (iv), which is, "The re-building of the principal mansion-house on the settled land." I think that that may be read as including the re-building of part of the principal mansion-house on the settled land. By that I mean this: Assuming a wing was burnt down, or assuming a part was blown
- E down by storm or tempest, I should think it would be a wrong construction to put on this provision that unless it was all blown down, or all burnt down, you could not apply capital moneys to re-building it. I, therefore, think you may read the provision thus: "The re-building of the principal mansion-house or part of the principal mansion-house on the settled land." Then comes the question, are these stables part of the principal mansion-house? That is the only way in which the
- F stables are dragged in I think. There may be stables which are part of the principal mansion-house. As LINDLEY, L.J., said, and in this I entirely agree, there may be and are stables which are clearly not part of the principal mansion-house. But I will take it in this case that these stables which are near and in such propinquity to the principal mansion-house may be taken as part of the principal mansion-house. Therefore, the applicant progresses so far. But in the
- G circumstances of this case has there been a re-building of the stables, as there must be a re-building of the principal mansion-house to get it within s. 13 (iv)? In my judgment of the facts there has not been. The stables were not burnt down, the stables were not in decay. But all that was wanted to be done was to modernise and embellish them in the same way as the mansion has been modernised and embellished. The stables had become antiquated, and it is all done because the
- H house was improved up to date. Under those circumstances, that is not a re-building within the meaning of this provision. It is not argued that what the tenant for life is doing to the mansion-house would come within s. 13 (iv). And, in my opinion, what he is doing to the stables does not come within that provision.

- I only wish to make one more remark on s. 13 (iv), because the matter was debated. At one time I thought differently, but counsel for the tenant for life
- I has converted me. The words are, "The re-building of the principal mansion-house on the settled land: Provided that the sum to be applied under the subsection shall not exceed one-half of the annual rental of the settled land." I myself think, and I am only speaking for myself, that the settled land is not confined to Eastwell Park estate, but it includes the whole of the settled land which is in the settlement on the same trusts and the value of the income if rental, or interest of the money if invested. I agree that one would have to add together the value of the Lancashire estate and the Eastwell Park estate. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not at all differ from the last observation of my learned brother. I think it is right. A

LOPES, L.J.—I also wish to say that I do not differ. I said nothing before upon the point, because I did not think it was necessary for this case.

Re MORGAN. MORGAN v. MORGAN

Annuity—Rights of annuitant—Annual sum to grantee “or to his descendants”—Whether perpetual annuity. E

A testator gave all his property to his executors and trustees on trust out of the interest and rents thereof to pay “the following sums of money.” He then gave to A. “or to his descendants £250 per year.” He also gave a similar sum in like terms to each of two other persons; a sum of “£50 per year” to P.; “10s. per week” to S.; and to each of other persons “a legacy of £10.” He gave the residue of the interest and rents to charities. The will contained no residuary devise or bequest of the corpus of the estate. F

Held: on the construction of the will the gift to A. was not a perpetual annuity, and A. was not entitled to the capital sum which would produce such annuity, but only to £250 per annum during his life, the gift to his descendants being only a substitutional gift.

Appeal from an order dated Mar. 28, 1893, of STIRLING, J.

By his will, dated Nov. 20, 1889, Hosier Leslie Frederick Morgan, who died on Feb. 26, 1891, provided:

“I give and bequeath the whole of my property, both real and personal, in-

A reversion or expectancy, unto my executors and trustees hereinafter named and mentioned, upon trust to pay out of the interest and rents arising from the same the following sums of money: I give to my wife, Elizabeth Morgan, £250 per annum, also the use of the house in which I now reside, also the use of all therein contained; I give to Captain H. H. Morgan or to his descendants, £250 per year; also to Mr. Percy Morgan or his descendants £250 per year; B to Mrs. Annie Augusta Hardie or her descendants £250 per year; to Miss Susan Pratten £50 per year; to Mrs. Susan S. Seller 10s. per week; to each of the children of the late Mr. William Addis a legacy of £10. After the death of my wife I give the whole of the contents of my dwelling-house equally between Captain H. H. Morgan, Mr. Percy Morgan, and Mrs. Annie A. Hardie.

C As regards the residue of the interest and rents after the above payments have been made, I give one-tenth to the trustees of the Royal Ophthalmic Hospital, Moorfields, one-tenth to the trustees of the London Hospital, one-tenth to the trustees of St. Thomas' Hospital, one-tenth to the trustees of the Consumption Hospital, Victoria Park; one-twentieth to the City of London Truss Society, Finsbury Square; one-twentieth to the Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners' Royal Benevolent Society; one-tenth to be sent to Messrs. D Drexel, Morgan & Co., bankers, New York, for distribution amongst the poor in New York, or any other deserving charity; four-tenths to be sent to Messrs. Drexel & Co. or their representatives, bankers, Philadelphia, to be given by them in four equal shares amongst the poor or any deserving charities of the following four American cities of Philadelphia, Saint Louis, Chicago, and San Francisco."

E A question arose whether the yearly sums given to a named person "or to his descendants" were to be paid in perpetuity so as to confer the right to the capital sum representing the annuity or only during the life of the named person.

STIRLING, J., held that the gifts constituted annuities payable during the life of each named person. Two of the annuitants, Captain H. H. Morgan and Mr. P. Morgan appealed.

F Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Hastings, Q.C., and Warrington for Captain H. H. Morgan and Mr. P. Morgan.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, Buckley, Q.C., and O. L. Clare for the various charities.

J. W. Clarke for the Attorney-General.

G LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal turns on the true construction of a will which at first sight looks tolerably intelligible. I suppose, by the look of it, that the will was made by the gentleman himself, but, whoever made it, and whatever he may have meant, we have to deal with the language which he has used.

H The testator gives the whole of his property, real and personal, to his executors, and that is the only place where he talks of his property apart from the income of it, except as regards a small sum of £10, which I will allude to presently, and as regards some furniture. Having given all the property, real and personal, to trustees, the testator continues,

I "upon trust to pay out of the interest and rents arising from the same the following sums of money."

Why does he put in "interest and rents?" He has nothing to pay the following sums of money out of, except his property. He puts in, as it appears to me, "interest and rents," to exclude the idea that he is dealing with the corpus. However, he says,

"upon trust to pay out of the interest and rents arising from the same, the following sums of money: I give to my wife £250 per annum, also the use of the house in which I now reside, also the use of all therein contained."

He refers to "all therein contained" presently, but does not refer to the house again. A

"I give to Capt. H. H. Morgan or his descendants £250 a year; also to Mr. Percy Morgan or his descendants £250 per year; to Mrs. Annie Augusta Hardie or her descendants £250 per year."

We were told that the Morgans were nephews, and Mrs. Hardie a niece. "To Miss Susan Pratten £50 a year." There is nothing about descendants there. She was a spinster, and perhaps he did not expect she would marry. "To Mrs. Susan S. Sellar, 10s. a week." All those are governed by the words B

"Upon trust to pay out of the rents and profits arising from the same the following sums of money."

Those are all annuities of some sum. Then comes: C

"To each of the children of the late Mr. William Addis, a legacy of £10."

That is not an annuity, but cash, also not to be paid out of his capital according to the will, but out of the rents and interest arising from the property. Then after the death of his wife he gives

"the whole of the contents of my dwelling-house equally between Captain H. H. Morgan, Mr. Percy Morgan, and Mrs. Annie A. Hardie." D

Leaving out the furniture, etc., those are the payments which he has directed to be made out of the rents and interest of his property. Then he continues:

"As regards the residue of the rents, and interest after the above payments have been made, I give one-tenth to" E one charity, and other shares to other charities; and many of those charities apparently have their principal places of work and offices in America. There is nothing else of any importance, and he appoints executors.

The question which arises is whether on the true construction of this will Captain Morgan and Mr. Percy Morgan are entitled to a capital sum which, if invested, I suppose, at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. now, will produce £250 a year. That is to say, are they entitled, putting it roughly, to £10,000 apiece? It is said they are on the construction of the will and on the authority of certain decided cases. I confess that, looking at the construction of the will, without troubling ourselves with cases, I cannot get out of this will any apparent intention to give these gentlemen anything more than an annuity. I cannot see any sign of an intention to give them a portion of the corpus of his property. On the contrary I think the indications are that the testator did not intend anybody to have the corpus, not even the charitable institutions. His notion was that they should have the income. He never thought anything about the corpus, and was not dwelling on the disposal of the corpus at all. He was giving them what he says is an annuity. I think as regards his wife, and I should say as regards Miss Pratten and Mrs. Susan Sellar, it is too plain for doubt. F

Associated with that, however, there are three annuities or sums or yearly payments of £250 apiece, which are given to his nephews and niece, or to their descendants. If the expression were "and" their descendants I think that there would be considerable force in the argument that they were to take perpetual annuities; but it is "or" their descendants, and there is no context which justifies us in reading "or" as "and." Reading it as we find it, the legal effect of it is that Captain Morgan takes £250 a year if he survives the testator; if he does not, but if he leaves descendants, which means children or grandchildren or great grandchildren, living at the death of the testator, those children, grandchildren, or great grandchildren will take £250 a year as joint tenants, and that will come to an end when they die. They do not take £250 apiece, that is evidently not intended, but they take £250. It is a substitutional gift in the event of Captain Morgan dying in the testator's lifetime. I do not doubt that is the true effect of the expression, "to Captain Morgan or his descendants £250 per year." G

- A Then it is said that inasmuch as the testator only disposed of property by reference to the interest and rents that expression was used by him as equivalent to or as another mode of dealing with the securities. I do not so read it. I cannot help thinking that the scheme of this will is to leave all that he has to charity, subject to such provisions as he has made for his nephews and niece. He gave them £250 a year, or their descendants if they died. Except to that extent he
- B intends everything to go to the charities.

- On that I should have thought the matter reasonably plain, but we are pressed with authorities. I do not see why, if we see what a man intends, and can give effect to his intention as expressed, we should be driven out of it by other cases, or decisions in other cases. Of course there are principles of law which are to be applied to all wills, but if once one gets at a man's intention, and there is no
- C law to prevent one from giving effect to it, I think that effect should be given to it. The only case which is of any real importance is Bent v. Cullen (1), which no doubt was singularly like this. There are differences as there are differences between all wills. One difference I do not think is very important, but it is a difference which accords with the view which I have adopted. It is that these particular annuities are associated with others which are certainly annuities—there is no doubt of it at
- D all. That is an indication of intention, but I cannot help thinking that in Bent v. Cullen (1) LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., did for a moment fail to observe the difference between giving a person a portion of the income of a fund and something payable out of it. I cannot help thinking he did so from the language which was commented on in the course of the argument, and which is to be found in his judgment. In cases of this class the distinction is not very important, but in other
- E cases it becomes all important as was pointed out. Supposing the fund becomes deficient it makes all the difference in the world whether a legacy is a portion of a fund or a charge on that fund.

- I do not think that LORD HATHERLEY throws any doubt at all on the soundness of the view expressed more recently by FRY, J., in Blight v. Hartnoll (2) that if an annuity is a charge as distinguished from a gift of a portion of the fund, the
- F annuity is not a perpetual annuity. I do not think the law is really open to much doubt; the application of it is the difficulty. I will read from the decision of FRY, J., in Blight v. Hartnoll (2), what I take the law to be. He says (19 Ch.D. at p. 296):

- G “As a general rule there can be no doubt that the gift of an annuity to A. is a gift of the annuity during the life of A. and nothing more.”

- That seems to be uncommonly good sense. If I give a person an annuity I do not mean it is to last for ever. If I meant it to last for ever I should give my money in another shape. No doubt that is prima facie the legal effect. He also says (ibid.):

- H “It is equally free from doubt that where the testator indicates the existence of the annuity without limit after the death of the person named, and therefore implies that it is to exist beyond the life of the annuitant, there the annuity is presumed to be a perpetual annuity.”

- That is to say if the annuity is given not only to the person but afterwards to others, in language showing there is to be no end of it, of course it is a perpetual annuity. He continues (ibid.):

- I “It is equally without doubt that there are cases in which the court has come to the conclusion that the gift is not really that of an annuity, but the gift to a person of the income arising from a particular fund without limit, and there the court holds that the unlimited gift of the income is a gift of the corpus from which the income arises.”

It cannot be said here that these annuities are the gift of a portion of a particular fund. The testator gives the whole of his property to executors, and he tells the executors to pay, out of the income, a certain sum of money to such and such people. It appears to me that this is distinctly a charge on the income as distinguished from a gift of a definite portion of the income of the particular fund. If so, there is nothing in LORD HATHERLEY's judgment which prevents our giving effect to the view which I have adopted. A

It is very difficult to see how LORD HATHERLEY came to his decision in Bent v. Cullen (1) except on the footing that there was a momentary forgetfulness of the distinction to which I have referred. He had there a gift out of the income of a particular fund, and the gift of the residue was of income and interest, and I agree that it is very difficult to say that there are grounds for deciding this case one way and that case the other. But after all what have we to do? We have to deal with the will before us, and I cannot see that it was anything more than a gift of an annuity of £250 in the ordinary sense of those words. I think, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed, and the appellants must pay the costs. B

LOPES, L.J.—Having regard to the cases it appears to me that the true test to be applied in construing this will is this: Are these annuities, having regard to the language used, charges on a fund or are they gifts of a part of a fund? If they are the former they would be payments to be made during the life of the taker. If the latter, they would be perpetual payments. After very careful consideration I have come to the conclusion, having regard to the language used, that these payments are charges on a particular fund and not gifts of a portion of this particular fund. C

I am quite aware that in arriving at that conclusion I am to a certain extent placed in a difficult position with regard to Bent v. Cullen (1), because I candidly admit that I am unable to distinguish the language in this case from the language used in Bent v. Cullen (1); but I find that Bent v. Cullen (1) is a case about which very little has been said, although it has been referred to in subsequent cases. It appears to me to be a decision which has been repeatedly avoided. There has been, it appears to me, rather a desire in no way to deal with it. I cannot get over the language used in this case "out of the rents and interest" and so on. It seems to me that the language points not to a gift of any particular part of this fund, but to a charge on this particular fund. D

I was very much impressed with the words "or his descendants," which are used in the case of two of the annuities, and "or her descendants," which are used in the case of another of the annuities of £250. At one time I thought that rather pointed to the payments being perpetual, but it is to be observed that the words are not "and to his" or "and to her" but "or to his" and "or to her" descendants. If it had been "and" the case I think would have been very different; the probability is that it would almost have caused us to come to a different conclusion to that at which we have arrived. What is said about these words "or his descendants" is that it makes the thing an alternative one. It is perfectly true that if annuities are dealt with as existing and as likely to be existing and being operative beyond the lives of those who are to take them, that would show an intention to make them perpetuities. It would show an intention on the part of the testator that the annuities should be perpetual. There is no doubt that that is so as a general rule, but according to my view, the true interpretation of these words "or his descendants" is that they were used simply for the purpose of preventing a lapse. E

With regard to the intention of the testator it is very difficult indeed to my mind to determine what his intention was, but I agree with what has been already said, that he intended in all probability not to dispose of the corpus but to create a perpetual trust. I think that is what he contemplated. I am inclined to think that it is very probable indeed that he would be more likely to desire to benefit his relations, such as the Morgans are, than the charities which are mentioned in the latter part of his will. It is also perfectly true that if his intention is such as I have stated, namely, to create a perpetual trust, we are defeating his intention with regard to the different charities, though I think that, having regard to the F

A strength of the language, we cannot put any other interpretation than that which we have placed on the earlier part of the will, and, therefore, this appeal should be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that certain principles have been laid down which it is too late now to quarrel with—certain
B principles which the cases from those in the House of Lords downwards have followed. The court is called on to determine whether an annuity given in a will is an annuity for life or an annuity in perpetuity. I do not understand that this court in the judgment they are giving are trenching on those principles at all.

The principles deducible from the cases seem to me to be these: First of all, if an annuity is given per se, that is an annuity for life. It seems to me pretty clear
C if the annuity is charged on the income or rents and profits of the estate that is an annuity for life. If, however, it is found that the intention of the testator is to charge the corpus or portion of the corpus of the property which he leaves, although he may do it in form by way of annuity, that is an annuity in perpetuity. It seems to me those three principles have been laid down, and nothing that has fallen from this court trenches on that. The difficulty arises in construing the instru-
D ment keeping those three principles in mind; and in so doing one must make up one's mind under which of those three principles this instrument falls. LINDLEY, L.J., has said everything I could wish to have said, and better than I could have said it, on the true construction of this will, and I agree that if it is clear what is the true construction of a will and the intention of a testator this court ought not to be forced out of that opinion because some other court, on some other will, has
E said that some other testator means otherwise.

As I said, LINDLEY and LOPES, L.J., have put a construction on this will with which I agree, and the only doubt which I have had has been caused by the decision of LORD HATHERLEY in Bent v. Cullen (1), because, as LINDLEY, L.J., says, and it is apparent to everyone who reads this will and then reads that will, that they are most uncommonly like each other, but there are differences. All the annuitants in
F this will are put in a bunch, and there are certain annuitants who I think clearly are not intended by the testator to take more than an annuity for life. It is said that the others take more than an annuity for life, that they take an annuity in perpetuity. That state of things LORD HATHERLEY had not before him in the will which he had to construe. I have also come to the conclusion that Bent v. Cullen (1), as has been pointed out, has not been acted on, whether it is right or wrong.
G In construing this will I am clearly of opinion that these annuities never were intended by the testator to be a gift of the corpus, or part of the corpus of the estate, and therefore they are only annuities for life.

R. v. TYLER AND ANOTHER

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bowen and Kay, L.J.J.), July 28, 1891]

[Reported [1891] 2 Q.B. 588; 61 L.J.M.C. 38; 65 L.T. 662;
56 J.P. 118; 7 T.L.R. 720]

Court of Appeal—Jurisdiction—“Criminal cause or matter”—Company—Failure to forward list of members to registrar—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict., c. 89), s. 26, s. 27—Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict., c. 66), s. 47.

A joint-stock company having (it was alleged) made default in forwarding a list of its members to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies as required by the Companies Act, s. 26, application was made to a magistrate for a summons charging the company with this default, for which a penalty was imposed by s. 27 of the Act. The magistrate refused to hear the application, and a rule nisi for a mandamus against him to hear and determine it was obtained, and afterwards discharged by the Queen's Bench Division. On an appeal to the Court of Appeal a preliminary objection was raised as to the jurisdiction of the court.

Held: default by a company in complying with the provisions of s. 26 of the Act of 1862 was a criminal offence, and so the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division was a judgment “in a criminal cause or matter” within the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, s. 47, and no appeal would lie to the Court of Appeal.

Notes. For ss. 26 and 27 of the Companies Act, 1862, see now ss. 124-127 of the Companies Act, 1948. Section 47 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, has been replaced by s. 31 (1) (a) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925.

Appeal from an Order of the Queen's Bench Division (DAY and LAWRENCE, JJ.), discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus which had been obtained against Alderman Tyler, of the city of London, ordering him to hear and determine an application for a summons under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 27.

H

Thomas Noton laid an information before Alderman Tyler, a magistrate of the city of London sitting at the Mansion House, charging the International Commercial Co., Ltd., with having made default in forwarding a list of its members to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies. By the Companies Act, 1862, s. 25, every company under the Act shall cause to be kept in one or more books a register of its members, and certain particulars as to the members are required to be entered therein.

By s. 26 it was provided:

"Every company under this Act, and having a capital divided into shares, shall make, once at least in every year, a list of all persons who, on the fourteenth day succeeding the day on which the ordinary general meeting, or if there is more than one ordinary meeting in each year, the first of such ordinary general meetings is held, are members of the company; and such list shall state the names, addresses, and occupations of all the members therein mentioned, and the number of shares held by each of them, and shall contain a summary specifying the following particulars. . . . The above list and summary shall be contained in a separate part of the register, and shall be completed within seven days after such fourteenth day as is mentioned in this section, and a copy shall forthwith be forwarded to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies."

By s. 27 :

"If any company under this Act, and having a capital divided into shares, makes default in complying with the provisions of this Act with respect to forwarding such list of members or summary as is hereinbefore mentioned to the registrar, such company shall incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds for every day during which such default continues, and every director and manager of the company who shall knowingly and wilfully authorise or permit such default shall incur the like penalty."

The magistrate refused to issue the summons, and a rule nisi for a mandamus requiring him to hear and determine the application which was obtained against him was afterwards discharged by the Queen's Bench Division. Thomas Noton appealed to this court.

A preliminary objection was raised that the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division was a judgment in "a criminal cause or matter" within s. 47 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and that, therefore, the appeal would not lie.

BOWEN, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus against Alderman Tyler, directing him to hear and determine a complaint against the International Commercial Co., Ltd., under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 27. The Queen's Bench Division having refused the mandamus, a preliminary objection has been taken here that this court has no jurisdiction to hear the appeal on the ground that the case is one of appeal from a judgment of the High Court "in a criminal cause or matter" within the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, s. 47. Proceedings before justices for the recovery of penalties under an Act of Parliament are shown in many cases before this court to be criminal matters, from Mellor v. Denham (1) and R. v. Whitchurch (2) down to Ex parte Schofield (3). We have now to inquire whether the proceedings against this company for penalties under s. 27 of the Act of 1862 are a "criminal cause or matter" or not.

First we must consider s. 26, for default in complying with the provisions of which these proceedings are taken under s. 27. It deals with a list of members of the company, and requires it, with a summary of certain particulars, to be kept in a certain way, and a copy of it forwarded to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies. If s. 26 were not followed by s. 27, it could not be doubted that a duty would be created by it in the company, and that if the company did not comply with the provisions of the section there would be a breach of its duty which would amount to a disobedience of the law. It was at first suggested by counsel for Noton that no criminal proceedings can be taken against a corporation, and it is necessary in order to make the steps of our reasoning clear that we should examine that proposition. It would seem contrary to reason to hold that persons could evade a duty cast on them by statute by forming themselves into a company, and still more so when an Act of Parliament imposes a duty upon a company itself. In such a case how is the duty to be enforced otherwise than by indictment? The directors of the company are really responsible for the negligence of the company in not complying with the statute, but they perhaps might not be struck at. It

A may, therefore, I think, be taken that when a duty is imposed on a company in such a way that a breach of it amounts to disobedience of the law, such a breach can properly be the subject of an indictment against the company. That was the law laid down in R. v. Birmingham and Gloucester Rail. Co. (3) by PATTESON, J., when, in delivering the judgment of the court, he referred (3 Q.B. at p. 232) to

B "a number of cases which show that a corporation may be indicted for breach of a duty imposed upon it by law, though not for a felony or for crimes involving personal violence, as for riots or assaults."

That was a case of nonfeasance, but the doctrine is the same in cases of misfeasance.

C In R. v. Great North of England Rail. Co. (5), LORD DENMAN, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said (9 Q.B. at p. 325) :

D "The argument is that for a wrongful act a corporation is not amenable to an indictment, though for a wrongful omission it undoubtedly is; assuming in the first place that there is a plain and obvious distinction between the two species of offence. No assumption can be more unfounded. Many occurrences may be easily conceived, full of annoyance and danger to the public, and involving blame in some individual or some corporation, of which the most acute person could not clearly define the cause or ascribe them with more correctness to mere negligence in providing safeguards, or to an act rendered improper by nothing but the want of safeguards."

E Moreover, he says that in R. v. Birmingham and Gloucester Rail. Co. (4) the court did not intend to lay down that it is only for nonfeasance that a corporation is indictable. COCKBURN, C.J., in Pharmaceutical Society v. London and Provincial Supply Association (6), considered the same point. He says there (4 Q.B.D. at p. 319) :

F "Although it is true that a corporation cannot be indicted for treason or felony, it was established by the case of R. v. Birmingham and Gloucester Rail. Co. (4) that an incorporated company might be indicted for nonfeasance in omitting to perform a duty imposed by the statute—such as that of making arches to connect lands severed by the defendants' railway. It was further held in R. v. Great North of England Rail. Co. (5) that an incorporated company could be indicted for misfeasance—as in cutting through and obstructing a highway, though they could not be indicted for treason, or felony, or offences against the person."

G It is, therefore, clear that in an ordinary case of a duty imposed by statute, if a breach of it is indictable in the case of an individual, a corporation cannot escape the consequences of committing a breach through the fact of its being a corporation.

H It was further argued that a section in an Act of Parliament directing an act to be done does not necessarily make disobedience to it an offence if it afterwards imposes a penalty for such a breach. Cases may exist where no duty to the public is imposed by the statute, but only a pecuniary loss on the individual as the result of his non-compliance with the provisions of the Act. In such a case disobedience is not intended to be a misdemeanour; the object of the Act is only that a person not complying with it must submit to a penalty. This is a question of the construction of different Acts of Parliament. We must, therefore, inquire here whether this Act of Parliament, by s. 27, directs certain things to be performed by the company which the company may escape from doing if they like to pay the penalty, or whether it imposes an absolute duty on the company and gives a remedy to enforce obedience which does not relieve the company from the consequences of its disobedience to the duty imposed on it.

I So far from showing that the company need not comply with the provisions of s. 26 if it prefers to pay the penalty, s. 27 seems to me to show that a breach of these provisions is a disobedience to the law. The Act does not merely intend that a breach is to be a condition precedent to the recovery of the penalty. Section 27 throws light on s. 26, and shows clearly that a breach of s. 26 is an offence, and that a proceeding under s. 27 is a criminal proceeding. It would be very remarkable if the legislature imposed on the company a duty the breach of which was not an offence, and yet if the directors of the company acquiesced in the breach they should be deemed guilty of an offence. Such a view would emancipate the company, on whom the duty was imposed, from being an offender and make its directors who acquiesced the only offenders. I do not think that that can be the true meaning of the section. The use of the words "knowingly and wilfully" in s. 27, where the company's directors and managers are referred to, implies that the duty is imposed on the company, not on the directors except as agents of the company. Though the directors or managers are to be punished for permitting the company to be in default, the company itself is not less in default, nor is the character of that default altered. This is the way, I think, in which the words "knowingly and wilfully" are to be explained, and if the section be so read it creates a duty, a breach of which is a disobedience to the law. If so, it is an offence to disobey the provisions of s. 26; and, though by s. 27 a summary pecuniary remedy is given as a punishment instead of an indictment, that is a matter which makes no difference.

It is possible that, in addition to the summary pecuniary remedy, an indictment might lie for this disobedience to the law, but that is a matter which it is unnecessary for us to discuss now. It is enough to say that the mere creation of a summary remedy does not show that disobedience to the provisions of s. 26 does not amount to an offence against the law. If this disobedience of the company is an offence, then the proceedings taken against the company under s. 27 for its punishment are proceedings in the nature of a criminal cause or matter. That appears to me to be the true meaning of the section. Not to come to such a conclusion as this would be drawing distinctions so fine as to be almost pedantic between the case of the company and the case of its directors or managers who would be guilty of an offence in knowingly and wilfully permitting that which in the company is no offence at all. The Act says that a company shall do certain things, and if it does not do them it is a criminal offender.

This appeal, therefore, cannot be entertained, because, under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, this court has no jurisdiction to hear an appeal in a criminal cause or matter. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The more that this Act of 1862 is examined the plainer it appears that by these sections a duty is imposed on joint-stock companies. By s. 25 every company under the Act shall cause to be kept in one or more books a register of its members with certain particulars, and by s. 26 every such company shall make at least once in every year a list of all persons who are members of the company, such list containing a summary specifying certain particulars, which list and summary is to be contained in a separate part of the register, and a copy thereof shall be forwarded to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies. The object of making this list is shown by s. 32, which provides that the register of members shall be open to the inspection of any member gratis, and of any other person on the payment of a small sum. This is a very important duty of the company in the interests not only of the shareholders but the public also. Then s. 25 and s. 26 being quite imperative in their terms, s. 27 provides that any company under the Act making default in complying with the provisions of the Act with respect to forwarding the list and summary to the registrar shall incur a penalty not exceeding £5 for every day during which such default continues. It is clear that that penalty is by no means intended to be an equivalent for the performance of the duty imposed on the company by s. 26, and the company cannot by paying the penalty continue to neglect to perform the duty because the penalty imposed is one for each day during which the default continues. It is important to notice this, as otherwise the company could not be compelled to make the list

A and do with it as they are directed. Therefore, it seems to me that s. 27 renders the company liable to a penalty of such a character that the only conclusion must be that it was intended to be a punishment for not complying with the duty imposed by s. 26.

B As to the question of taking criminal proceedings against a company, it is clear that where an Act of Parliament imposes on a company a duty of performing some act described in the statute, and at the same time does not provide any other remedy, an indictment will lie against the company for non-performance of its duty. In R. v. Birmingham and Gloucester Rail. Co. (4) the duty imposed by the statute on the company was to build certain arches to connect lands which had been severed by the railway, and they were ordered by justices to build the arches but omitted to do so. PATTESON, J., referring to the nonfeasance by the company of their duty to build these arches, said (3 Q.B. at p. 232):

"A corporation may be indicted for breach of a duty imposed on it by law, though not for a felony, or for crimes involving personal violence, as for riots or assaults."

D In that case an omission by the company to perform its statutory duty was held to be a criminal act for which it might be indicted. That case was approved of in Pharmaceutical Society v. London and Provincial Supply Association (6) and in London Joint Stock Bank v. London Corpn. (7), and it has been held that the law applies to corporations for misfeasance also, as well as nonfeasance. It was argued here that a criminal act involves a mens rea, and as a company can have no mens at all it can never be a criminal; but that argument is disposed of by those cases.

E As to that part of the argument by which it was maintained that it was intended by this statute not to make the disobedience of the company a criminal offence, but an offence which the company might make compensation for by paying the penalty, I agree that there may be cases of an alternative given by an Act of Parliament so that a corporation has the choice either of doing what the Act directs or paying a penalty, but I am satisfied that that is not the meaning of this Act. The penalty imposed by it is a penalty properly so called; it is inflicted by way of punishment, not by way of compensation for the breach. I am satisfied that this Act meant to impose on a company an important duty whose omission is in the nature of a criminal act; and even if this penalty be the only remedy for the breach, as to which I express no opinion, that does not show that the omission by the company to do what is required of it by the Act is not any the less a criminal omission.

G For these reasons I think that we cannot entertain this appeal, and that it must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Stamp Duty—Conveyance on sale—Private Act of Parliament—Railway company acquiring undertaking of another railway company—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict., c. 39) s. 54.

By a private Act of Parliament a railway company was dissolved and its undertaking transferred to the Great Western Rail. Co., the latter company paying and issuing to the shareholders of the dissolved company consolidated guaranteed stock of the Great Western Rail. Co. Under the private Act a Queen's printer's copy of the Act was to be chargeable with the same stamp duty as would be chargeable if the transaction effected by the Act had been effected by an executed instrument in writing and the copy were the instrument.

Held: a Queen's printer's copy of the Act was chargeable with ad valorem duty, as on a conveyance on sale, on the value of the stock in the Great Western Rail. Co. issued to the shareholders of the dissolved company.

Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (CAVE and WRIGHT, JJ.), on a Special Case stated by the Inland Revenue Commissioners pursuant to the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 13.

The Special Case, so far as it is necessary to set it out, was as follows:

(i) The Great Western Railway Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict., c. xxxiii) which was passed on June 28, 1892, and intituled "An Act for conferring further powers upon the Great Western Rail. Co. in respect of their own undertaking, and upon that company and the London and North-Western Rail. Co. in respect of undertakings in which they are jointly interested, for amalgamating the Calne, the Newent, the Ross and Ledbury, and the Wellington and Severn Junction Railway Companies with the Great Western Rail. Co., for vesting in that company the powers of the East Usk Rail. Co., for vesting the undertaking of the Ludlow and Clee Hill Rail. Co., in the Great Western and London and North-Western Railway Companies, and for other purposes," contains recitals:

"(A) that the undertaking of the Calne, the Newent, the Ross and Ledbury, and the Wellington and Severn Junction Railway Companies, are under the authority of Parliament leased to or worked by the Great Western Rail. Co.,

A (in that Act and hereinafter called "the company") and that the third schedule to the Act contains in the first three columns thereof a statement of the particulars of the capitals issued by the said companies respectively. (B) That the company have under the authority of Parliament subscribed for, and now hold by themselves or their nominees, the shares, debentures, and debenture stock of the said companies specified in the fourth column of the same schedule, B and the company or their nominees have also subscribed for and now hold the shares and debentures of the said companies mentioned in the fifth column of the same schedule, and that it is expedient that the said companies should be amalgamated with the company in the manner provided by the Act. (C) That the East Usk Rail. Co. (in the Act hereinafter called "the East Usk Co.") were unable without the assistance of the company to raise the capital required C for the construction of their railway, and it was agreed between the company and the East Usk Co. that the traffic on the East Usk Railway should be worked by the company, and it is expedient that the powers of the East Usk Co. should be transferred to the company. (D) That the Ludlow and Clee Hill Railway is worked, managed, and maintained by the company and the London and North-Western Rail. Co. (in the Act, and hereinafter called "the North-Western Co."), and it is expedient that the said railway should be transferred to and vested in the said companies;" D and makes provision in reference to the amalgamation and transfers of the said railways and their powers. (ii) By s. 2 of the said Act, relating to the Incorporation of General Acts, Part V (relating to amalgamation) of the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, is, except where expressly varied by the said Act, incorporated with and forms part of the said Act. (iii) By s. 3 of the said Act relating to the interpretation of terms and expressions used in the Act, it is provided that the expression "the amalgamated companies" means and includes the Calne Rail. Co., the Newent Rail. Co., the Ross and Ledbury Rail. Co., and the Wellington and Severn Junction Rail. Co., and that the expression "the amalgamated undertakings" means and includes the undertakings of the amalgamated companies respectively. These expressions are similarly used in this case. E

F (iv) Sections 32 to 42 of the said Act relate to the amalgamated companies. The material sections are as follows:

G "32. The several undertakings of the amalgamated companies shall, subject to the contracts, obligations, debts, and liabilities of those companies respectively, be amalgamated with and form part of the undertaking of the company, subject nevertheless to the provisions of this Act, and each such amalgamation shall take effect as on and from the first day of July, 1892, and as on and from that date the said companies are respectively dissolved, except for the purpose of winding-up their affairs. A Queen's printer's copy of this Act shall be chargeable with the same stamp duty as would be chargeable if the transaction effected by the Act with reference to each of the amalgamated companies were a transaction, effected by an executed instrument in writing and the copy were the instrument, and that copy shall, within three months from the date of amalgamation, or from the passing of this Act, whichever shall last happen, be produced as such instrument to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for their opinion as to the stamp duty chargeable thereon, under the provisions of the Stamp Act, 1891, and all the provisions of that Act shall apply thereto accordingly, except that the company, if dissatisfied with the assessment of the commissioners, shall not be required to pay duty in conformity with such assessment as a condition of appeal to the High Court. H Provided, that in case of delay of payment under the above exception the amount of duty assessed or determined by the court to be chargeable shall be a debt due to Her Majesty, and shall be paid with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum, from the expiration of the said three months until the day of payment. I

33. The amalgamated companies shall be respectively entitled to all their revenues up to and inclusive of the 30th day of June, 1892, and except as hereinafter mentioned the amalgamated companies shall discharge and relieve the company of all their contracts, obligations, debts, and liabilities not chargeable to capital account, which shall have accrued up to the time of amalgamation.

34. As from the time of amalgamation the shares, debentures and debenture stocks, mortgages, or bonds of the amalgamated companies, held by or on behalf of the company, and specified in the fourth and fifth columns of the third schedule to this Act, shall be, and the same are hereby cancelled.

35. All mortgages or bonds of the amalgamated companies existing at the time of amalgamation and not cancelled by this Act, shall, during the continuance of such mortgages or bonds respectively, be charges upon the undertaking upon which such mortgages or bonds are respectively secured, but the company shall be liable for all interest which shall accrue thereon after the time of amalgamation, and as such mortgages or bonds fall due they shall be paid off, or may be renewed by the company, or the company may issue new mortgages or bonds in respect thereof, and all such mortgages or bonds shall be charges upon the undertaking of the company, and the company may raise by mortgage of their undertaking, or by the creation of debenture stock, all such sums as they may require for paying off mortgages or bonds falling due as aforesaid. Provided that the aggregate borrowing powers of the company and the amalgamated companies be in no case exceeded under the powers contained in this section.

36. As at and from the time of amalgamation the several holders of the shares in the capital of the Wellington and Severn Junction Rail. Co. shall, in lieu of and in exchange for the shares held by them respectively, become and be the holders of consolidated guaranteed stock of the company in the proportion of £100 of such stock for every ten shares of £10 each in the Wellington and Severn Junction Railway Company held by them.

37. As at and after the time of amalgamation the capital which immediately before the time of amalgamation was the capital of the Great Western Rail. Co., shall be increased by addition thereto in the manner and to the extent necessary to give effect to the provisions of this Act with reference to the Wellington and Severn Junction Rail. Co. Provided always, that any additions to the Great Western Rail. Co.'s consolidated guaranteed stock, made under the authority or for the purposes of this Act, shall be deemed to be part of, and shall rank pari passu with, the other like stock of the company."

(v) Sections 43 to 48 of the said Act contain provisions for the dissolution of the East Usk Co., and the transfer of all the rights, powers, privileges, and authorities which are conferred on the East Usk Co., whose undertaking is to become after the transfer part of the undertaking of the company.

(vi) Sections 49 and 55 have reference to the winding-up of the Ludlow and Clee Hill Rail. Co., and provide for the transfer of the undertaking upon a sale thereof to the company and the North-Western Co. The transfer is to be evidenced by a duly stamped deed of conveyance. Paragraph (vii) contained the third schedule to the Act, which shows that the company held the whole of the issued capital of the Newent and of the Ross and Ledbury Co., as well as of the Calne Rail. Co., excepting an amount of £11,600, and of the Wellington and Severn Junction Co. excepting £59,830. Paragraph (ix) stated that no agreement in writing was entered into in respect of the several amalgamations, but the company and each of the amalgamated companies passed resolutions approving the Bill.

The commissioners were of opinion that the copy of the Act was chargeable with duty as a conveyance or transfer on sale under the Stamp Act, 1891: (i) in respect of the amalgamation of the Wellington and Severn Junction Rail. Co., with an ad valorem duty in respect of the value on July 1, 1892, of £59,830 consolidated

A guaranteed stock of the Great Western Co., to be issued to the shareholders of the Wellington and Severn Junction Rail. Co.; (ii) in respect of the amalgamation of the Calne Railway, with an ad valorem duty in respect of the sum of £11,600; and (iii) in respect of the amalgamation of the other two companies, with a duty, in each case, of ten shillings. The question for the consideration of the court was, whether the commissioners had rightly assessed the duty payable on the copy of the Act of Parliament. The Queen's Bench Division (CAVE and WRIGHT, JJ.) were of opinion that the Act was chargeable with duty as assessed by the commissioners. The Great Western Rail. Co. appealed.

Cripps, Q.C., and Haldane, Q.C., for the railway company.

B The Attorney-General (Sir Charles Russell, Q.C.) and Danckwerts for the Inland Revenue Commissioners were not called on to argue.

C LORD ESHER, M.R.—I share the opinion of CAVE and WRIGHT, JJ., that this is an extremely clear case. The smaller company, as it is called, had property which in railway language is called its "undertaking," and therefore was the owner, as WRIGHT, J., has pointed out, of several railway lines and a great deal of other property. Then a transaction took place, which is contained in a written instrument, viz., in a private Act of Parliament. That Act made a transfer—
D no other word describes the transaction—of all the property of the smaller company to the Great Western Rail. Co. The Act does not in any way alter the Great Western Rail. Co., which after the Act had been passed remained exactly the same entity, exactly the same corporation, as it had been before, neither greater nor less. So, by this instrument in writing, by this Act of Parliament, the
E property and powers of the smaller company are transferred to the Great Western Rail. Co. This Act of Parliament has sanctioned the consideration which is to be given by the Great Western Rail. Co. for the transfer to it of the property of the smaller company. The Great Western Rail. Co. is to give to the smaller company or to the shareholders of the smaller company—it does not signify which—a certain number of shares in the Great Western Railway. If such a transaction
F as that had taken place between private persons, or between private companies, who, we must suppose, would not require the authority of an Act of Parliament, it would be carried out by an instrument in writing. The effect of the instrument would be to transfer the property from one party to the other for a certain consideration, and, whether or not it were drawn up in virtue of a previous contract of purchase and sale, its effect would be the same as if it were a conveyance
G executed in pursuance of a contract of purchase and sale. The substance of that transaction would be the transfer or conveyance of property for a consideration as though upon a contract of sale.

Turning to the Stamp Act, 1891, we find that a duty is payable on a "conveyance on sale." Are those words used in the Stamp Act to mean only a conveyance carried out in pursuance of a definite contract of purchase and sale, or are they
H not used in this Act to mean a conveyance carried out as though on a previous contract of sale? Used in the Stamp Act the words seem to me to bear the latter meaning. The transaction in this case being, in substance, of the nature which I have stated, it seems to me to come within the meaning of the phrase "conveyance on sale" in the Act. I, therefore, think that this transaction is directly within the Stamp Act, and that the decision of the Divisional Court in
I favour of the Crown is perfectly right.

LOPES, L.J.—It is an established rule in considering cases of this kind, viz., whether any particular instrument is liable to duty under the Stamp Act, that the substance of the transaction is alone to be considered. It appears to me that, looking at the substance of this transaction, it is a clear case of a conveyance on sale. It was observed by CAVE, J., that there is in this case everything that constitutes a sale. There are two parties, one of whom is parting with something and the other giving something for it. The arrangement ultimately come to is then carried out and embodied in an Act of Parliament. It was argued that the consideration, instead of passing to the smaller company, passed to the shareholders of that company. I fail to see that that can make any material difference, or make that which, on the face of it, is apparently a conveyance on sale anything else than a conveyance on sale. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed. A

KAY, L.J.—The Stamp Act, 1891, provides in Sched. 1 for certain ad valorem duties, payable on the “conveyance or transfer on sale of any property except” certain stock. Section 54 of the Act provides, that B

“for the purposes of this Act, the expression “conveyance on sale” includes every instrument, and every decree or order of any court, or of any commissioners, whereby any property, or any estate or interest in any property, upon the sale thereof, is transferred to or vested in a purchaser, or any other person on his behalf or by his direction.” C

The Great Western Rail. Co., under the powers of a special Act of Parliament, has obtained all the property and undertaking of certain other companies and cl. 32 in the Act, which enabled them to do so, is as follows: [His LORDSHIP read it; see para. 4 of the Special Case.] The special Act incorporates Part V, a group of sections headed “Amalgamation,” of the Railways Clauses Act, 1863. Section 37 of that Act provides that D

“for the purposes of this part of this Act, companies shall be deemed amalgamated by a special Act in either of the following cases . . . (2) where by the special Act a company or companies is or are dissolved, and the undertaking or undertakings of the dissolved company or companies is or are transferred to another existing company, with or without a change in the name of that company.” E

That is exactly what was done here by this special Act. The property and undertakings of the dissolved companies were transferred to and vested in the Great Western Rail. Co. without any change being made in its name. F

The argument, as I understand it, seemed to me to turn entirely on the meaning and effect of the word “amalgamation.” It was argued that in truth there was here a combination of two companies, but the difficulty that arises at once is, how can there be a combination of two companies one of which is dissolved? That is impossible. Then it was said that the Great Western Rail. Co., as the consideration for this so-called amalgamation, issued stock in certain proportions to the shareholders of the dissolved company, and thereby took into itself the shareholders of the dissolved company, and so an amalgamation was constituted between the two companies. Therefore, it was argued, there was no transfer as on a sale. The attempted analogy was this: that, if two partnerships carrying on the same kind of business were united, and all their business and property thrown into one, there would be no transfer as on a sale. To meet that argument let me put an instance. Supposing in this case that instead of shares the consideration for the transfer or so-called amalgamation had been cash, and that it had been handed directly to the company before it was dissolved, for the purpose of its being divided by the company amongst its shareholders. Would that be a sale or would it not? It seems to me impossible to say that it would not, though counsel would not admit it. I cannot understand what a sale means if that would not be a conveyance as on a sale. G
I

It is to be observed that the Stamp Act, 1891, has nothing to do with contracts or negotiations. It requires a stamp on a conveyance on a sale, and a conveyance on a sale is the instrument by which the property is transferred on a sale. In the case which I have put, it seems to me impossible to doubt that the transfer would be a transfer on a sale. Then take the case, instead of the roundabout proceeding, of the cash being paid direct to the shareholders of the dissolved company, and not paid to the dissolved company to distribute among its shareholders. What is

A the substantial difference? I can see none. Then take the case, which is this case a little altered, of handing to the dissolved company stock in the company which was taking over the property for the purpose of distribution amongst its shareholders. Would not that be a sale and purchase? Of course it is not admitted, but I cannot see the reason why.

B In the present case, instead of handing the stock to the dissolved company for distribution by it among its shareholders, the stock has been given straight to the shareholders of the dissolved company. Substantially that seems to me to be a purchase and sale of the property, business, powers, and everything else that is involved in the word "undertaking" of the company which was to be dissolved. The transfer was effected by this special Act of Parliament, and this Act is to receive the same stamp which an instrument in writing, carrying out the same arrangement, would have been subject to if the companies had had power to execute it without a special Act of Parliament. Supposing the companies had had that power, and the transfer had been made without an Act of Parliament, one company would, by the deed of conveyance, have conveyed over the whole of its property to the other company, the other company paying as a consideration the money's worth in stock, which it has practically handed over in the way I described to the smaller company.

D The reason why that has been treated as the consideration, and the only consideration, is that all the debenture stock and debts of the companies transferring belonged to the Great Western Rail. Co. already, so that all that the Great Western Co. had to buy was practically an equity of redemption, something subject to that debt. The ad valorem duty has not been computed on the debt, but has been computed on the price which the company has paid for what

E I, by way of analogy, call the equity of redemption which it had to buy. That seems to me perfectly right, and I think the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I think that I ought to add that we cannot distinguish this case from Furness Rail. Co. v. I.R.Comrs. (1).

Easement—Light—Ancient lights—Crown property vested in trustees—Sale by trustees—Prerogative of Crown—Prescription Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), ss. 2, 3.

The words "or other easement" in s. 2 of the Prescription Act, 1832, do not apply to an easement of light, which is exclusively dealt with by s. 3 and the subsequent ancillary sections.

The Crown is not bound by s. 3 of the Prescription Act, 1832, it not being named in that section.

In 1820 the site of the old Bankruptcy Court in Basinghall Street in the city of London was purchased by the government out of moneys provided by Parliament, the conveyance being made to trustees of the Crown and confirmed by Act of Parliament. The building on the site was used for the purposes of the Court of Bankruptcy until 1886, when it was sold to the corporation of the city of London. In 1890 the site became vested in the defendant under a building agreement with the corporation. The defendant having commenced to erect buildings on the site, the plaintiffs sought injunctions to restrain him from erecting them in such a way as to obstruct the access of light to their buildings which they had enjoyed prior to the pulling down of the old Bankruptcy Court. Owing to the custom of the city of London, no prescriptive right to light had been acquired by the plaintiffs prior to 1820, but the plaintiffs claimed that such a right had been acquired under the Prescription Act, 1832, s. 2 and s. 3.

Held: from 1820 to 1886 the equitable ownership of the property was in the Crown; the Crown, not being named in s. 3 of the Prescription Act, was not bound thereby and, as the Crown's rights continued up till 1886, the plaintiffs had not acquired a right to light as against the defendant.

Motions.

- These actions were commenced by the plaintiffs for the purpose of restraining the defendant from erecting any buildings of a greater height than the old buildings standing on a site in Basinghall Street in the city of London, so as to darken any of the ancient lights of the plaintiffs as the same were enjoyed previously to the pulling down of the old buildings, and notices of motion for injunctions to this effect were served on the defendant. By consent, the motions were entered in the non-witness list, and the hearing of the motions were treated as the trial of the actions. The question was whether the plaintiffs could have acquired any prescriptive right to the access of light to the premises over the old buildings, they having been Crown property from 1820 to 1886.

Feb. 17, 1891. CHITTY, J.—Since the close of the argument I have been furnished with a statement compiled with great industry by junior counsel for the defendant showing in whom many of the public government buildings in London are vested, and the public statutes by which they are so vested. From this paper, as well as from inquiries I have made on the subject, it appears that there are several government buildings held in trust for the Crown under modern statutes. For instance, the General Post Office is vested in the Postmaster-General in trust for Her Majesty. The decision in these cases has, therefore, an importance extending beyond the interests of the parties engaged in this litigation. A

The plaintiffs claim a right to access of light to their dwelling-houses over the site of the old Bankruptcy Court, in Basinghall Street, in the city of London, subject only to the obstruction which was caused by that building. The site of the court was purchased in 1820, and the building was shortly afterwards erected thereon, the moneys required for the purchase and the erection of the building being provided by Parliament. On April 23, 1820, the site was conveyed to five subjects nominated by the Crown as trustees, and the conveyance was made to them in fee B

“in trust for His Majesty and his successors, and to the intent and purpose only that certain buildings might be erected on the said ground for the meetings of the Commissioners of Bankruptcy, and for the transaction of business in bankruptcy.” C

This conveyance was confirmed by the public statute 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 115. Section 4 enacted that the ground and buildings should thenceforth be vested in the five trustees named in trust for His Majesty, his heirs and successors, to the intent that the ground and buildings erected or to be erected thereon, might for ever thereafter be used and applied for the purposes and in the manner described in the Act (that is, putting it shortly, for the purposes of the Court of Bankruptcy), subject to such rules respecting the use thereof as the Lord Chancellor might make, and for no other purpose. By s. 60 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, the ground and building were vested in the commissioners of the court for the time being for the purposes of the Act. This left the Crown's title as beneficial owner unaffected. By s. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the ground and building were vested in the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings; and it was enacted that the same should be appropriated to such purposes as the Lord Chancellor should direct. This enactment also left the Crown's equitable title unaffected, unless and until the Lord Chancellor directed that the property should be appropriated to some purposes other than those to which the property had been previously dedicated. D

Even apart from the trust for the Crown in the conveyance and the statute of Geo. 4, it cannot be doubted that, where property is held for such public purposes as those described in the above Acts, the equitable title is in the Crown. The building was used for the purposes of the Court of Bankruptcy until after the passing of the Act of 1861, and also until it was sold and conveyed in 1886 to the Corporation of London, pursuant to a direction of the Lord Chancellor in exercise of the power conferred on him by s. 68 of the Act of 1861. On the execution of this conveyance the Crown's title was divested. The evidence does not disclose the purpose for which the building was used after it had ceased to be used for the purpose of the Court of Bankruptcy. It must be presumed, however, that it was in fact used for some public government purpose. E

The Crown's title thus continued down to the conveyance in 1886. The defendant claims under this conveyance. The result is, that from 1820 to 1886, a period of sixty-six years, the legal estate was vested in trustees, who were subjects and mere depositaries of the legal estate, but the sole equitable ownership was in the Crown for the public purposes of the Acts, and during the same period the Crown had, by its ministers of justice and other officers, the sole and exclusive possession of the property. F

The plaintiffs claim the access of light under s. 3 of the Prescription Act, 1832, the Act for shortening the time of prescription in certain cases, which came into G

A operation on the first day of Michaelmas Term, 1832. The Crown is not named in that section, but is named in ss. 1 and 2. Therefore, regard being had to the general rule that the Crown is not bound by a statute unless named, a very strong case arises for holding that the Crown is not bound by s. 3. It was, however, argued for the plaintiffs that the Crown is bound by necessary implication, because the servient tenement is not mentioned in s. 3. I am unable to follow this argument. It is true that the servient tenement is not expressly mentioned in the section, although it is referred to by the words "any local usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding," words which apply to the servient tenement only. But it appears to me to be a wholly immaterial circumstance whether the servient tenement is mentioned or not. It is not a circumstance from which any intention on the part of the legislature to bind the Crown can be inferred; much less is it sufficient to raise a necessary implication, or to support an irresistible inference of intention to bind the Crown. I hold, then, that the Crown is not bound by s. 3.

It was further argued for the plaintiffs that the right to light falls within the meaning of the term "or other easement," in s. 2, in which the Crown is named; and in support of this argument the observations of LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Dalton v. Angus (1) were cited. But, although LORD SELBORNE, L.C. (6 App. Cas. at p. 798), was of opinion that the right of support in the case of two adjoining buildings—a right he considered to be an easement not purely negative—fell within s. 2, he did not say that the negative right to light was within that section, nor is there anything in his observations to justify an argument that he held any such opinion. To whatever other easements the terms of s. 2 may extend, it is, I think, clear that they do not include light. The statute places the acquisition of the right to access of light on a footing entirely different from that on which it rests the other incorporeal hereditaments with which it deals. The right to light is dealt with exclusively by s. 3 and the subsequent ancillary sections, such as s. 4, which defines the period of the twenty years, and what is meant by interruption. By the Act, the right to light as between subject and subject is acquired indefeasibly by simple enjoyment for the statutory period of twenty years without the statutory interruption, unless the enjoyment be by consent or agreement expressly made or given by deed or writing. If s. 3 is contrasted with s. 2, it will be found to cover, and more than cover, every case that could possibly be included within the latter section. The statute provides a simpler mode for the acquisition of light than it does for the acquisition of other easements or rights. The statute has been in operation for considerably more than half a century, and hitherto no one, so far as I am aware, has ever contended that light falls within s. 2.

The plaintiffs further contended that, previously to the conveyance of 1820, the right of light to their tenements had been acquired by prescription at common law, or that a lost grant ought to be presumed, so that, when the Crown acquired its title to the site of the Bankruptcy Court, the site was already subject to the servitude of light which they claim. But, according to the evidence put in on behalf of the plaintiff Salaman, there was standing thereon an ancient building. The evidence is to the following effect: In 1398, there was standing on the ground a building called Blackwell Hall, which belonged to King Richard II. This building was then sold by the King to the Corporation of London. In 1658, the hall was rebuilt. In 1666, it was destroyed in the Great Fire. In 1672, it was again rebuilt on the same site. The building standing on the ground was used from 1398 to 1820 by the corporation as the Cloth Hall. This evidence is fatal to the plaintiff Salaman, for a reason presently to be mentioned. From the statute of 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 115, it appears that the ground comprised in the conveyance of 1820 included part of the site of the ancient Cloth Market of Blackwell Hall, or the building belonging thereto and that other part thereof was the site or part of the site of two messuages in Basinghall Street.

The result then is, that in 1820 the defendant's site was occupied by the ancient tenement of the Cloth Hall or market, and by other messuages which, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, must be presumed to be ancient. To these tenements the custom of the city of London extended, which custom was that a man might rebuild his house or other edifice on the ancient foundation to what height he pleased, though thereby the ancient windows or lights of the adjoining or opposite house were obstructed, if there were no agreement in writing to the contrary: see Wynstanley v. Lee (2). The plaintiffs' houses have been rebuilt in recent times, and evidence was given for the purpose of showing that parts of their windows are in the same position as the lights of the houses which previously stood on their ground. Some evidence is given on behalf of the plaintiff Salaman with a view to show that his lights were ancient; the evidence, however, is for the most part conjectural, and of an unsatisfactory character. But, assuming that it would in the ordinary course be sufficient to raise a case on which a jury might find that the light had been enjoyed from time immemorial, or that a lost grant ought to be presumed, there is a short answer in point of law which is fatal to any such claim in all the cases before me. The presumption of any such right from twenty years' enjoyment previously to 1820 is excluded by the custom of the city of London; to allow any such presumption would be to destroy the custom: Wynstanley v. Lee (2).

The same answer applies with equal force to the period of twenty years which elapsed down to the first day of Michaelmas Term, 1832, when the Prescription Act, 1832, came into operation. Curiously the custom of London as to light is not simply abolished by that statute, but it is abolished merely for the purposes of s. 3. The plaintiffs cannot, therefore, maintain their claim to light by prescription from time immemorial, or as founded on a supposed lost grant. This claim is defeated by considerations wholly independent of the Royal prerogative, and the passage cited from STAUNFORD ON THE KING'S PREROGATIVE at pp. 42, 43, if a correct statement of the law, is irrelevant.

The argument for the plaintiffs then turned back to s. 3. It was contended that, although the section might not apply where the legal estate was vested in the Crown, it does apply where the legal estate is held by subjects in trust for the Crown. In support of this contention, some authorities were cited for the plaintiffs, but none of them really touched the point; one of them was Sharp v. St. Sauveur (3). All that was decided in that case was, that the Crown could enforce in the Court of Chancery a trust of land created for an alien prior to the Naturalisation Act, 1870. That has no bearing on the cases before me. In ancient times it was not the practice to vest the legal estate in trustees for the Crown, and thus there is little or no direct ancient authority on the point. The second resolution in the Magdalen College, Cambridge Case (4) appears, however, to be large enough to cover it. It was resolved that, where the King has any prerogative estate, right, title or interest, he shall not be barred of them by the general words of an Act of Parliament. There is no reason for confining this resolution to mere legal interests, or for excluding an absolute beneficial ownership in the Crown. In Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron (5), a case involving the question of the liability of the Mersey Docks to be rated to the poor under the statute of Elizabeth, LORD CRANWORTH stated the law as to the exemption of the Crown in the following passage (11 H.L.Cas. at p. 508):

"The Crown not being named is not bound by the Act. It follows, therefore, that the land or houses occupied by the Crown or by servants of the Crown for the purposes of the Crown are not liable to be rated; and I conceive that it is from a confusion between property occupied for public purposes, and property occupied by servants of the Crown, that this mistake has arisen. This principle exempts from rates not only Royal palaces but also the offices of the Secretaries of State, the Horse Guards, the Post Office, and many similar buildings. On the same ground police courts, county courts, and even county buildings occupied as lodgings at the assizes for the judges have been held exempt. These decisions however have all gone on the ground more or less sound, that these might all be treated as buildings occupied by servants of the

A Crown, and for the Crown, extending in some instances the shield of the Crown to what might more fitly be described as the public government of the country. In none of these cases was exemption conceded on the ground contended for in the present case, and I cannot but think that the error which has crept into the decisions has arisen from confusing cases like the present with those in which the interests of the Crown, or the Crown through its servants were directly concerned."

B The judgment of LORD BLACKBURN in R. v. McCann (6), a rating case, is much to the same effect. He expressly places (L.R. 3 Q.B. at p. 146) a trustee for the Crown in the same position as a servant of the Crown. In the cases before me, the Crown's absolute beneficial ownership for the purposes of the Act is expressly manifested by a public statute, and it is obvious that the bare legal estate was vested in trustees merely for the purposes of more convenient administration by a department of the Queen's government. I am of opinion, then, that the prerogative of the Crown takes these cases out of the operation of s. 3.

C Only one other point remains. It was urged for the plaintiffs that the defendant's ground being now held by him, a subject, he is not entitled to avail himself of the Crown's rights, and that, inasmuch as the plaintiffs have in fact enjoyed the light for twenty years before these actions, their title to the light is indefeasible. But this is only repeating one of the old arguments on the statute in a new form. It would allow the plaintiffs to claim that they were in process of acquiring the right to the light during that part of the twenty years during which the property was in the possession of the Crown. The case must be tried as if the actions had been brought the day after the conveyance of 1886. To hold that the statutory period of twenty years had then run would be to ignore the Crown's rights; and the result would be that the Crown could not dispose of the property for the interest therein to which it was then entitled; or, in other words, that, although the Crown held the property free from the servitude or easement of light, it could not dispose of it except subject to such a servitude or easement. There are, as I understand, other points of fact in dispute in these actions, but it was arranged by counsel that these should not be gone into until after I had given judgment on the above questions of law, and that it would not be necessary to go into them at all in the event of my judgment being (as it is) adverse to the plaintiffs on the questions argued. On the facts as I have stated them, giving rise to these questions of law, there was no dispute between the parties. The result is that the actions are dismissed with costs.

Summons for the taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs and delivery of documents, the applicant disputing the retainer.

The respondent, John Charles Llewellyn, acted as solicitor to the applicant, David Sanders, in obtaining a mortgage for him on his property. All costs due from the applicant personally to the respondent were paid. A transfer of the mortgage was effected without notice to the respondent. The applicant took a release by deed from the mortgagee. The respondent had acted also as solicitor for the mortgagee in the matter of the mortgage, and set up a lien for costs on certain deeds in his possession which related to the mortgaged estate. These costs were incurred in taking possession under the instructions of the mortgagee, in obtaining a judgment against the mortgagor on his covenant, and in conducting an attempted sale. The respondent had obtained possession of the deeds as solicitor to the applicant, the mortgagor, but now contended that he held them for the mortgagee. He delivered his bill of costs in the name of the applicant, but now admitted that

A no express retainer had ever been given him by the applicant, and that he had now no bill of costs against him personally. On the present summons, the question of lien alone was argued.

Maidlow for the summons.

Aug. 5, 1891. CHITTY, J., stated the facts, and continued: I will assume, in favour of the respondent, that among the documents he holds there are some which relate to the title of the mortgaged property, and that though he received them originally from the applicant, the custody was changed, and that he afterwards held

C them as solicitor for the mortgagee.

After the admission of the respondent that he had no bill of costs against the applicant personally, it is clear that the lien claimed on the documents of title is merely a lien in virtue of the right of the mortgagee to hold such documents. But it appears from the evidence that the applicant has settled all accounts with his mortgagee, and that the mortgagee has no longer any claim against him for the D costs included in the bill in question, and consequently no lien as against him on the documents of title, nor any right to withhold them from him. There is no suggestion in the evidence that the settlement of accounts between the applicant and his mortgagee, who was mortgagee in possession, was come to for the purpose of defeating any lien of the respondent, and it is unnecessary to consider what might have been the effect of such evidence if given.

E The question, then, is whether the respondent has any lien on the documents of title as against the applicant. The nature of a solicitor's lien is so well established that it is scarcely necessary to state its nature, or on what grounds it is founded. It is not the result of contract; it is not an equitable charge; it is not an encumbrance affecting the estate itself: see LORD ST. LEONARD's judgment in Blunden v. Desart (3). It does not confer on the solicitor any higher right to retain deeds than

F the client himself has (ibid. at p. 418). There is some error in the language attributed to the judges who decided Ogle v. Story (1), as reported in 4 B. & Ad. 735, where apparently an attorney's lien is spoken of as a pledge. In the case as reported in 2 L.J.K.B. 110, the term "pledge" does not appear. This case was cited as an authority on behalf of the respondent; but it has no bearing on the case now before me. It was an action to recover money from the attorney; the true

G ground of the decision was that the plaintiff had overpaid the mortgagee, and the plaintiff ought to have sued him and not the attorney: see LORD ST. LEONARD's judgment in Blunden v. Desart (3), 2 Dr. & W. at pp. 426, 427.

The nature of a solicitor's lien is stated clearly in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD CRANWORTH in Pelly v. Wathen (4). He says (1 De G.M. & G. at p. 23):

H "The general lien of a solicitor is merely a right to keep back from his client the deeds and papers, which he holds as solicitor, until his bill of costs is satisfied. It is a right derived entirely through the client, and, therefore, on the most obvious principles of justice, cannot go beyond the right of the client himself. If the client's right to the deeds which came to the hands of the

I solicitor is absolute, so will be the right of the solicitor. If the deeds in the hands of the client are subject to any rights outstanding in third parties, such rights will follow them into the hands of the solicitor. These consequences flow so immediately from the nature of the relation subsisting between the client and his solicitor, that, even independently of authority, we should have felt bound by principles on which they depend."

And again (ibid. at p. 27), he says, in effect, that the right to hold title deeds in virtue of a solicitor's lien is subject to all rights, legal and equitable, affecting them in the hands of the person from whom he received them.

These principles are illustrated by numerous authorities which it is unnecessary to cite. From these it follows that when the mortgagor has paid to the mortgagee all that is due to him for principal, interest, and costs, and the mortgagee has given the mortgagor a release, the mortgagee's solicitor has no right to retain the deeds as against the mortgagor, even for costs due to the solicitor from the mortgagee for work done relating to the mortgaged property pending the mortgage; the equitable right of the mortgagor to have from the mortgagee his deeds on payment of principal, interest, and costs, prevails against the solicitor's lien claimed in right of the mortgagee. In Wakefield v. Newbon (2) there had been a re-conveyance to the mortgagor, and it was held that he was entitled to recover the deeds from the mortgagee's attorney. Here the mortgagee has released the mortgagor and conveyed the property to another mortgagee by the direction of the mortgagor; the only difference between the cases is that there the mortgagor had a legal right to the deeds; here he has only an equitable right.

If the new mortgagee had claimed the deeds, the result might have been different, but he has made no such claim. The documents of title having originally come into the possession of the respondent as solicitor for the applicant, the applicant is entitled to have them delivered back to him now that the lien is gone. There is no question as to the applicant's right to have back all documents belonging to him not relating to the mortgaged property. The order must be in the usual form, for delivery of all documents in the respondent's hands, on oath. The respondent must pay the costs. Inasmuch as the documents came into the possession of the respondent originally as solicitor for the applicant, it is not necessary that an action should be brought; the order can properly be made in the matter of the solicitor. It is unnecessary to consider the question, whether, by setting up wrongly a lien to retain the documents for a debt due from the applicant personally, the respondent has not waived his lien: Dirk v. Richards.

Detinue—Recovery of goods—Co-owner of chattel—Right to immediate possession—Absolute or special property in goods—Chattel bailed to other co-owner and lodged by him with defendant as security for debt.

The plaintiff was co-owner with F. of a box, and it was agreed between them that the plaintiff should keep possession of it until he was able to sell it. Afterwards he entrusted the box to F. to take to an auctioneer. F. gave it to the defendant as security for money which he owed him. In an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover possession of the box,

Held: as the plaintiff had the right to immediate possession of the box as well as a special property in it by virtue of the agreement, an action for detinue would lie, and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

D

Per LOPES, L.J.: A person who is entitled to the possession of a personal chattel can maintain an action for detinue if he has the right to the immediate possession at the date of the writ arising out of an absolute or special property.

G

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action brought for the detention of a gold snuff-box.

The plaintiff had purchased a gold snuff-box for £130, and under an agreement with one Frankenheim it was arranged that the plaintiff should remain in possession of the box until it was sold, and that he should try and sell it. It was also agreed that when it was sold the proceeds should be divided between them. Some time afterwards the plaintiff entrusted it to Frankenheim to carry to Christie's, where it was to be sold by auction. Frankenheim, instead of doing this, gave possession of the box to the defendant as security for a debt which he owed.

H

At the trial of the action before A. L. SMITH, J., with a jury the only question which he left to the jury was whether Frankenheim put the box into the defendant's possession to keep his half share in it as security for the debt, and this question the jury answered in the affirmative. Upon further consideration the learned judge ruled that the plaintiff had no cause of action. The plaintiff now moved for judgment or a new trial.

Willis, Q.C., and Fillan for the plaintiff.

W. H. Clay for the defendant.

May 7, 1892. FRY, L.J.—This is a case in which the plaintiff, who was owner of a gold box, entered into an agreement with one Frankenheim that Frankenheim should become owner of half the box, while he, the plaintiff, should keep possession and have the selling of it. Apparently the jury found, and it must be taken to be so, that Frankenheim gave possession of the box to the defendant for value. The plaintiff is now suing the defendant to recover the box. The other facts of the case are that, after the box had remained for some time in the plaintiff's hands, he handed it to Frankenheim to take it to be sold by auction at Christie's, and Frankenheim passed it on to the defendant as security for a debt which he owed to him. The question now is, whether the plaintiff can maintain an action of detinue. A

I adhere to the statements in SELWYN'S NISI PRIUS and in BULLEN AND LEAKE ON PLEADING, that detinue is maintainable by anyone who has the immediate right to possession of personal chattels, whether arising out of an absolute or special property. I do not go beyond that, and the decision in Fenn v. Bittleston (1), which is a strong authority for that proposition. That being so, the question is an easy one: Had the plaintiff acquired any special property in the box? It was argued that there was no tenancy in common of the box, because the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of it under the agreement with Frankenheim; but I do not accede to that argument, because I think that the possession of the plaintiff was the possession of the plaintiff and Frankenheim. Nevertheless, there was here the special agreement entered into which I have mentioned, that the plaintiff should have possession of the box till it was sold, and should also have the power of selling it. B

The true conclusion to draw is, I think, that a special property was thereby created in the plaintiff for a term which was to last during his life, but was defeasible by the sale of the box. There was, therefore, a special property in the plaintiff, and the right of possession which he had being only given up for a specific purpose, which was not carried out, he became entitled again to immediate possession. As he had therefore both a special property in the box as well as a right to immediate possession, the action of detinue is maintainable. This point was not really pressed before A. L. SMITH, J., as the true result of the transaction between the plaintiff and Frankenheim, and though we are differing from his judgment, it might have been different if his opinion had been taken on this point. D

We must order judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for £130, or the return of the box. E

LOPES, L.J.—My view as to the law of detinue is that a person who is entitled to the possession of a personal chattel can maintain an action of detinue if he has the right to the immediate possession at the date of the writ, arising out of an absolute or special property. I cannot see how a person can have the right to immediate possession without having some property in it. It must be conceded that the plaintiff would have had no better right to possession of the box as against the defendant than Frankenheim, if there had been no special agreement between him and Frankenheim. Here there was an agreement that the plaintiff was to keep the box until it was sold. He afterwards entrusted it to Frankenheim to take to Christie's, but instead of doing so Frankenheim handed it to the defendant as security for a debt. That was a bailment of the box to Frankenheim for a special purpose, which he did not carry out. Under those circumstances the plaintiff's right to the immediate possession of the box at once accrued, and he is therefore entitled to maintain this action. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed. F

FRY, L.J.—I wish to add that LORD ESHER, M.R., has asked me to say that he agrees in the conclusion at which I arrived, and in the reasons I have given. G

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Settlement within two years of bankruptcy—Husband and wife—Gifts of jewellery by husband to wife within two years of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), s. 47.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 47: “(1) Any settlement of property not being a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage, or made in favour of a purchaser or encumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration, or a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife, shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy. . . . (3) ‘Settlement’ shall for the purposes of this section include any conveyance or transfer of property.”

A husband at various times bought jewellery and gave it to his wife. Within two years of the gifts he was adjudicated bankrupt. On an application by the trustee under s. 47 to avoid the gifts,

Held: s. 47 applied to cases where the circumstances of the gift made it manifest that the subject-matter of the gift was intended to be preserved by the donee; in the present case the husband intended his wife to keep the jewellery; and, therefore, the gifts constituted “a settlement of property” within the section and were void against the trustee.

Motion for a declaration that certain pawn-tickets representing jewellery given by a bankrupt to his wife within two years of the bankruptcy were the property of his trustees in bankruptcy.

The parties were married on Feb. 24, 1881. There was no settlement, and between December, 1889, and December, 1891, the bankrupt presented to his wife certain valuable diamonds. The occasions selected for making such presents were Christmas Day, the anniversary of their wedding-day in 1891, and another occasion when a horse called Romance belonging to the bankrupt, won a race. Subsequently the debtor pawned part of the jewellery for £80, and afterwards, being pressed by a bankruptcy notice, he handed over some more to Messrs. Hirsch, pawnbrokers, for a temporary loan. On Dec. 8, 1891, a receiving order was made against the bankrupt, and on Jan. 9, 1892, he was adjudicated bankrupt. A

Cur. adv. vult. B

Oct. 27, 1892. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., read the following judgment.—It is extremely difficult to extract from the decided cases any clear definition of the transfers which will and which will not fall within the operation of this section. The section, as CAVE, J., points out in Re Player, Ex parte Harvey (1), has a history. The word "settlement" did not appear in the Bankruptcy Act, 1603. The words there were C

"shall convey or procure or cause to be conveyed to any of his children or other person any lands, goods, or chattels, or transfer his debts into other men's names, it shall be in the power of the commissioners to dispose thereof as if the bankrupt had been actually possessed thereof." D

In Kensington v. Chantler (2) LORD ELLENBOROUGH held that money did not fall within the section, which was confined to things which were the subject of conveyance, and capable of being conveyed and procured to be conveyed. LORD ELLENBOROUGH did not mean by this that the section only extended to land, and did not extend to personal property; he meant apparently that the section did not apply to a gift of money which if given directly to the donee could not have been intended to be preserved, and seems to have mentioned the fact that money was not included in the words of the statute rather as an illustration that the statute was not intended to apply to gifts of personal property not intended to be preserved by the donee than as a definition of the subject-matter intended to be the subject-matter of the section; indeed, in the very case of Kensington v. Chantler (2) a portion of the property the transfer of which was held not to be within the section was flats or boats given by the bankrupt to his son for the purpose of a salt-work business carried on by the son, which flats were still in the possession of the bankrupt down to the date of his father's bankruptcy. E

I infer from this and other decisions on the same lines referred to in the textbooks that the judges so read the section as to make the application of it depend on the intention of the donor, at all events to the extent that the section did not apply to cases where the circumstances of the gift made it manifest that the subject-matter of the gift was not intended to be preserved by the donee, as would be manifest in the case of a gift of money to a son to advance him in business, or to a son for his maintenance. F

The words of the Act of 1603, so far as they affect the point under discussion, remained unaltered until 1869, when for the first time the word "settlement" was introduced in the bankruptcy statute, and substituted for the words which I have cited. Perhaps the object of the change was, on the one hand, to indicate that the section was not intended to apply to transfers of property which from the nature and circumstances of the transfer showed that the "donor" did not contemplate the preservation of the actual subject-matter of transfer by the transferee, and, on the other hand, to indicate that the section did apply to the transfer of a sum of money when the intention was manifest that the money should be preserved either in its original form or in some other form of investment. It is difficult to account for the use of the word "settlement" in substitution for the word transfer or conveyance unless the legislature intended to indicate that the transaction to fall within the statute must not be such as to negative a contemplation by the "donor" of the possible permanency of the subject-matter of transfer as the property of the transferee. This is what I understand CAVE, J., to mean when G

"although 'settlement' by the 3rd subsection 'shall for the purposes of this section, include any conveyance or transfer of property,' yet I think the view of my brother MATHEW is well founded, and that a settlement in the ordinary sense of the word is intended. The transaction must be in the nature of a settlement, though it may be effected by a conveyance or transfer. The end and purpose of the thing must be a settlement, that is, a disposition of property to be held for the enjoyment of some other person."

B Taking this view, I am afraid that a present of diamonds by a man to his wife is a present which I ought to hold was a settlement on the wife; it seems to me that, to use the words of CAVE, J., the purpose of the transaction was the preservation of the thing, whatever its form, for the enjoyment of the other person. I think the "donor" contemplated the retention by his wife of the present which he gave her. I should have held just the same if he had given her money to buy herself a present. It will be observed that in Re Player, Ex parte Harvey (1), where the transfer of the shares was held to fall within the section, the actual gift was of money to buy the shares.

C I wish to add that if I had had to construe the section apart from previous decisions I am not at all sure that I should not have limited its operation to written transfers. I am not sure that this is not what LORD ELLENBOROUGH meant in Kensington v. Chantler (2), but it is quite impossible at this time to introduce such a limitation into the section, which up to the present time has never been introduced, at all events expressly, in any of the judgments given in the decided cases.

I A notice of objection to the renewal of a publican's licence stated, inter alia, that the house in respect of which the renewal was sought was of a disorderly character. It was admitted that the applicant himself was of good character, but evidence was offered in support of the objection of three convictions against previous tenants for offences against the Licensing Acts. The justices refused to renew the licence.

Held: the character of a public-house was distinct from that of the person conducting it, and the evidence was properly admitted.

Notes. For restricted power of licensing justices to refuse renewal of an old on-licence, see now s. 14 of the Licensing Act, 1953. Section 13 of the 1953 Act, dealing with power to refuse renewal of an old off-licence, has been repealed as virtually spent by the Licensing Act, 1961, but without prejudice to s. 14 (3) of the 1953 Act. By that section justices have power to refuse an application to renew an old beerhouse licence on grounds specified in paras. (a) to (c) of s. 13 (2) of the 1953 Act. These grounds include, inter alia, "that the house or shop to which the application relates . . . is of a disorderly character, or frequented by thieves, prostitutes, or persons of bad character". By s. 14 (4) justices have the power to refuse a renewal of an old on-licence, other than an old beerhouse licence, on the ground, inter alia, that the licensed premises have been "ill-conducted." For s. 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, as amended by s. 26 of the Licensing Act, 1874, see now s. 11 of the Licensing Act, 1953. A

Rule Nisi for a writ of mandamus directed to the justices of the Miskin Higher Petty Sessional Division of the county of Glamorgan, to hear and determine the application of Thomas Pitman, for the renewal of his publican's licence for the Angel Inn, Aberdare. D

The affidavit set out that the applicant obtained a transfer licence of the premises at a special sessions held in April, 1892, having previously entered upon the premises. The general annual licensing meeting for the division was held on Aug. 23, 1892, and seven days before that day, viz., on Aug. 13, there was served upon the applicant by the superintendent of police a written notice of objections to the renewal of his licence on the following grounds: E

- "(i) That a house licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor is not required in the neighbourhood in which your house is situate; (ii) that your house in respect of which a renewal of your licence is sought is of a disorderly character; (iii) that your house is not structurally adapted to the business carried on there." F

The first objection contained in the notice, which was a printed form, had been struck out before service, and was as follows:

- "That you have been convicted of an offence under the Licensing Acts, and therefore you cannot procure satisfactory evidence of your character." G

At the general annual licensing meeting on Aug. 23 the applicant attended, but the justices adjourned the hearing of his case to an adjourned meeting to be held on Sept. 27.

On Sept. 12 the clerk to the justices sent a written notice from the justices to the applicant to attend personally at the adjourned meeting, but the notice contained nothing about the grounds of objection. At the adjourned meeting on Sept. 27 the applicant attended with his solicitor, prepared to meet the objections stated in the notice. The clerk to the justices however proposed to prove three convictions against previous holders of the licence. To this the applicant's solicitor objected that the notice had not specified any objection upon that ground, and the justices, if they entertained an objection of which no notice had been given, would be acting without jurisdiction, and contrary to the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 42, and the Licensing Act, 1874, s. 26. The proposed evidence of convictions was against previous holders of a licence for the same house, one on May 1, 1888, for permitting drunkenness; one on Aug. 21, 1891, for keeping open on Sunday, and one on Mar. 15, 1892, for permitting drunkenness. None of the convictions was against the applicant. The justices, notwithstanding the applicant's objection, admitted evidence of the above convictions. The objections on the other grounds mentioned H

A in the notice were dismissed. At the end of the hearing the justices refused the renewal of the applicant's licence, the chairman observing that although they were not bound to give any reasons, it might be taken that it was on the ground of the convictions. This rule was accordingly obtained, and the justices made no affidavit, being satisfied that the affidavit of the applicant set forth the facts correctly.

B J. V. Austin for the justices, showed cause.
J. Paterson in support of the rule.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. It is an application for a mandamus to order the justices to hear and determine an application for the renewal of a public-house licence. The answer is that they C have already done so. It appears to me that the justices were acting well within their jurisdiction in deciding as they did. I do not say whether or no I should have decided in the same way, but I am clearly of opinion that they had legal evidence before them of the ground on which their decision was based. Here was an applicant who was admitted to be of good character. Objection is taken against him that his public-house is of a disorderly character. The evidence offered in D support of the objection consists of three convictions against previous tenants of the house in 1888, 1891, and 1892 respectively. In the opinion of the magistrates these convictions showed that the house had been conducted in a disorderly manner; and I think they were entitled so to find. The applicant's counsel takes the objection that to say that a house is disorderly is to call mere bricks and mortar disorderly. I cannot agree with that view, and it is plain that Parliament E does not think so; because a "house of a disorderly character" is a parliamentary phrase, and it is one of the objections that may be made to a perfectly new applicant, so that it is plain that the house itself may be held to be of a disorderly character, as distinct from the person who is conducting it. The evidence therefore was perfectly admissible, and whether it was sufficient was a question entirely for the magistrates.

F As for the larger question whether the magistrates might have acted upon a ground not specified in the notice of objections, the law has been pronounced by the House of Lords in Sharp v. Wakefield (1). But that point does not arise here, because the magistrates have in fact acted upon a ground of which the applicant had due notice.

G WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with counsel for the justices that the short result of Sharp v. Wakefield (1) is that when objections have been properly and formally made to a renewal of a licence, the justices are at liberty to go into other grounds of objection than those contained in the notice, so long as they are not grounds personal to the applicant. But in this case the magistrates did act upon a ground which was specified in the notice, and the question is H whether they had any legitimate evidence to justify them in so acting. The ground on which they acted was that the house was of a disorderly character. The objection, says the applicant's counsel, means no more than that the applicant is a person who has conducted the house in a disorderly way. I entirely dissent from that view. I think that the policy of the Act was something much wider than that. This is shown by s. 9 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 [repealed].

I Under that Act in the case of a perfectly new applicant, it may be shown that the house is of a disorderly character. I think the policy of the Act was quite in the opposite direction to that suggested, and was intended to provide for the house being conducted continuously in an orderly way. Every one knows what a well-conducted house means, although in its literal sense it is nonsense. It is the transference by a figure of speech of the things done in the house to the house itself. A house as well as a man, may have a certain character stamped upon it, and no matter in whose hands it has got that character, the justices may take it into account. The evidence in this case may or may not be slender. With that we have nothing to do. I myself think it was sufficient. There were three convictions against previous holders of the licence in 1888, 1891, and 1892. That might be sufficient to affect the character of the house, and I think the policy of the Act was that such a character should not be got rid of merely by a change of tenant. I therefore agree that the application must be dismissed.

Company—Debenture holders' action—Receiver and manager—Appointment by court—Carrying on business—Personal liability on contracts.

A receiver and manager appointed by the court in a debenture holders' action to carry on a business is appointed to do so on his own responsibility, the sole control of the business being vested in him, and, in the absence of clear stipulation to the contrary, he can pledge no credit but his own and so is personally liable on any contract which he makes, e.g., for the purchase of goods for use in the business.

A Appeal by the defendants from a decision of MATHEW, J., at the trial without a jury in Middlesex, in an action by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants the price of goods sold and delivered.

A company, called Joseph Bull & Co., Ltd., carried on business as builders and contractors. In an action in the Chancery Division brought against the company by the debenture-holders, the defendant Bull and one Bird were appointed by the court to carry on the business of the company. Certain unsecured creditors of the company then presented a winding-up petition but no order was made, the arrangement being that second debentures should be issued to them to secure their debts, and one Hobbs should be appointed receiver and manager on their behalf in the place of Bird. The court ultimately appointed the defendant Ward, an accountant, to replace Hobbs and to act jointly with the defendant Bull on behalf of the unsecured creditors.

C Part of the business of the company consisted of two uncompleted contracts for building schools. For the purpose of completing these contracts the defendants ordered from the plaintiffs the goods for the price of which this action was brought. The order was in writing and purported to be given "For Joseph Bull & Co., Ltd.," and was signed "E. C. Bull—R. J. Ward, receivers and managers." At the trial D before MATHEW, J., without a jury, the defendants contended that they were not personally liable, and that the plaintiffs could look only to the assets of the company for payment. MATHEW, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

Farwell, Q.C., and Beven for the defendant Bull.
E Lawson Walton, Q.C., and C. A. Russell for the plaintiffs.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—This action was tried by MATHEW, J., without a jury, and was brought to recover the price of goods sold and delivered. The goods were timber supplied for the business of a builder. The building business had passed out of the hands of Joseph Bull & Co., Ltd., to the extent that the Chancery Division F had appointed managers and receivers of the business at the suit of debenture holders. What is the meaning and effect of such an appointment? The Chancery Division has taken the management of the business into its own hands, and has appointed managers of the business. What is the position of such managers? Are they agents of the court? If they are, they must obtain and act under the directions of the court. They are not the agents of the company, which cannot G control or dismiss them. Neither the company nor the debenture holders can control or dismiss them or give them orders as to the carrying on of the business. They can only make suggestions to the court that the managers are not doing the best that can be done in their interests, and ask the court to discharge them. When one person is in such a relation as that to another person, he is the agent of that other person. The manager, therefore, is the agent of the court.

H That being so, would the court make itself responsible? That is impossible. What then, must the court do? It is inevitable that it should so appoint its agent that he shall carry on the business on his own responsibility. He must, when necessary, order goods, etc., upon his own responsibility. It seems to me, therefore, to follow, as an inevitable consequence from the position, that the manager I must make himself personally liable. What SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said in Sargant v. Read (1) shows that he was of that opinion, and that the rule was well known and did not require to be proved. I think that what CHITTY, J., said in Taylor v. Neate (2) is to the same effect, that when a court appoints a manager, it knows that he must make contracts which can pledge no credit but his own. That, in my opinion, is the position of a manager appointed by the Chancery Division.

When the question has to be determined as to the liability of the manager under a contract with another person, if that person has contracted upon other terms, he cannot then turn round and say that the manager is personally liable. If the manager tells the person with whom he is contracting that he is a manager, and gives his order expressly upon the terms, which are not the ordinary terms, that such person is to be paid only out of the funds of the business if there are any, then such person cannot say that the manager is personally liable. There may be, therefore, cases in which orders are accepted not upon the personal credit of the manager. If, however, no such special stipulations are made, and orders are given by the manager simply as manager, then the inference is that the manager is personally liable. If that were not so, the consequences would be most serious. No tradesman could deal with a manager without making inquiry as to the existence and extent of funds belonging to the business and the number of creditors; so also in the case of workmen and servants in respect of their wages. Those considerations show that the contention is absurd.

That being so, in this case we have to look at the order which was given, and at what took place, and not to consider the use of the words "receivers and managers." The defendants could not be the agents of the company, because they were not appointed by the company. They signed as "receivers and managers," but that is only a legal term showing the persons who dealt with them what their position was, namely, that of receivers and managers appointed by the court, and that they were dealing on the credit of the receivers and managers. The question is one of fact in every case, because special circumstances may take any particular case out of the general rule. In this case it has been found that the transaction came within the ordinary rule. That decision was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The learned judge at the trial found that the defendants, who were receivers and managers appointed by the court, were personally liable. The question is one of fact, and must always be so in every case. The question is: On whose credit were the goods supplied? It is said that the defendants were only agents. Whose agents were they? It is suggested that they were the agents of the company, but that could not be so. In my opinion, it is impossible to contend that the defendants were the agents of anybody. The sole control of the business, subject to the jurisdiction of the court, was vested in the defendants. In my opinion, the goods were supplied upon the credit of the defendants. They gave the orders, as receivers and managers, to the plaintiffs, who knew what the position was. It is said that it is hard upon the defendants to make them personally liable. They can, however, protect themselves. If there are not sufficient assets, they need not give orders at all, or they may give orders in such express terms as to avoid any personal liability at all. I am of opinion that they intended to incur personal liability. The decision of MATHEW, J., was right, and must be affirmed.

RIGBY, L.J.—This was an action to recover the price of goods sold and delivered. The order given for the goods was in the following form, which is probably the form usually used by a receiver and manager: "For Joseph Bull & Co., Ltd." (Signed) "E. C. Bull, R. J. Ward, receivers and managers." It appears to me that the use of the words "receivers and managers," if this had been a transaction between strangers, was enough to put persons upon inquiry as to the real position of the party ordering the goods. In Owen & Co. v. Cronk (3) it appeared that the person giving the order acted on behalf of a principal. In the present case they were not agents of any person or company, but had been appointed by a judge of the Chancery Division, in an action by debenture holders, in order to do what was supposed to be for their benefit, that is, to carry on the existing business of Joseph Bull & Co., Ltd. It was promised that a fund would be provided, and the defendants undertook the office of receivers and managers on that basis.

When a receiver and manager is appointed by the court, it is not intended to put forward an officer of the court to carry on a business, involving the making of contracts, in such a way as to deceive the public into a belief that someone else

A is personally liable. There may be special cases, which must be very special cases, in which a receiver and manager appointed by the court might be ordered not to deal with third persons without telling them that he would not be personally liable. I am not, however, aware of any such case having occurred. When a manager is appointed by the court to carry on a business, it is always intended that the manager shall be so appointed as to appear to carry on the business as a person who is personally responsible, except when he clearly stipulates to the contrary with the persons with whom he deals, and that he shall look to the assets for indemnity. It is impossible for the public to know for whose benefit the business is being carried on, and they must look to the manager as being liable. I do not say that it is the duty of such an officer of the court to incur heavy expenses, but it must be his duty to undertake the ordinary responsibilities of such a business as he has appointed to carry on. I do not say that he may not, in any case, come to the court and ask to be relieved from such duties. He cannot, however, get rid of such liabilities by simply stating that he is a receiver and manager. I think that, as soon as it appears that he has no principal, it is to be implied that when he makes a contract it binds him personally.

I am not surprised that there is not much authority upon this question. Receivers and managers have often been held to be personally liable, and this has been looked upon as well settled law. I am of opinion that such a receiver and manager is not appointed upon the model of an agent who has no principal, but upon the model of individuals in a fiduciary capacity who carry on a business for the benefit of others, such as executors and trustees, who are prima facie responsible to the outside world. That being the model, I think that the court, when it appoints a receiver and manager, intends that he shall be in the position of being personally responsible. The court never intended to create a position where their officer would carry on a business for the liabilities of which no one would be personally responsible. In the cases which have been cited the learned judges recognised the well-established rule that receivers and managers are personally liable.

Probate—Will—Circumstances exciting suspicion of the court—Onus on party propounding will to prove it expresses true will of testator—Fraud or undue influence—Onus of proof on party contesting will.

The rule throwing the onus on the party propounding a will to prove that it expresses the true will of the testator is not confined to cases where a will is prepared by or on the instructions of the person taking a benefit under it, but extends to all cases in which circumstances exist that excite the suspicion of the court. Wherever such circumstances exist, and whatever their nature may be, it is for those who propound the will to remove such suspicion or doubt, and to prove affirmatively that the testator knew and approved of the contents of the document. It is only when this is done that the onus is thrown on those who oppose the will to prove fraud or undue influence, or whatever else they rely upon, to displace the case made for proving the will.

Appeal from a decision of SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P.

By an indenture dated May 23, 1874, being a settlement made on the marriage then intended, and shortly afterwards solemnised, between George Bye and Rebecca Hatton, a freehold cottage and premises and a life interest in certain personality were assured to the Rev. George Purdue and John Painton upon trust to hold the same (inter alia) in case there should not be any child of the marriage who, under the trusts thereinbefore declared, should attain a vested interest in the trust premises, upon trust for such person or persons as Rebecca Hatton, whether covert or sole, by deed or will, should appoint.

George Bye died in 1880 and there were no children of the marriage. In 1880 and 1884 Mrs. Bye caused her solicitor to prepare wills, whereby she disposed of her property in favour of Painton and his children. In 1888, Purdue having died, Painton became sole trustee of the marriage settlement. Until that time Mrs. Bye had had complete confidence in Painton, but she then became dissatisfied with him, and ceased to regard him with favour. She complained of his conduct as trustee, and she took steps to have someone appointed trustee with him, and proposed her cousin, Edward Brooks Tyrrell. On Oct. 17, 1892, Mrs. Bye, being then in a bad state of health, instructed her solicitor as to making a new will in Tyrrell's favour. Before anything further was done towards making this proposed will, a doctor was consulted as to her mental capacity, and he declared himself satisfied that she was fit to make a will.

Mrs. Bye became worse, and she being very anxious to make the new will, and the matter appearing to weigh on her mind, steps were taken by her friends to

A enable her to carry out her wishes; and on Nov. 7, 1892, a new will, in favour of Tyrrell, was prepared at her house by her solicitor upon her instructions, and was executed by Mrs. Bye in the presence of her solicitor, the vicar of the parish, and the doctor. This will gave the cottage and the residue of her personal property to Tyrrell, whom she appointed executor, subject to a life interest in one part of the cottage (it being then divided into and occupied as two tenements), in favour of one Mitchell; it gave her household goods to Mitchell absolutely. It was manifest to all three witnesses that Mrs. Bye clearly understood the provisions of the will, and that she was, as she expressed herself, completely satisfied with what she had done.

C Two days later, namely, on Nov. 9, 1892, Mrs. Bye executed another will, which was attested by Thomas Painton, a son of John Painton, and Peter Rowland. This will was in the handwriting of Thomas Painton, and had been prepared by him upon verbal instructions from Mrs. Bye, and written in pencil by him on Nov. 8, 1892, and subsequently in ink on the following day. It was in favour of John Painton, giving him the cottage and the household furniture absolutely, subject to a life interest in part of the cottage in favour of Mitchell, and it appointed Joseph Painton, another son of John Painton, sole executor. The evidence of all the circumstances attending this will was such as to justify suspicion and to leave it doubtful whether the testatrix understood what the effect of it would be if it were admitted to probate. Mrs. Bye died on Nov. 22, 1892.

D On Feb. 1, 1893, Tyrrell commenced this action against Joseph Painton and John Painton, claiming to be the sole executor of the will dated Nov. 7, 1892, and to have that will established. The defendants alleged in their defence that the true last will of the deceased was the one which was dated Nov. 9, 1892, and they counterclaimed that the court should pronounce against the will bearing date Nov. 7, 1892, and grant probate of that bearing date Nov. 9, 1892. The plaintiff in reply alleged that the will of Nov. 9, 1892, was obtained by the undue influence and by the fraud of the defendants and Thomas Painton; that the deceased never gave instructions for it; and that the contents thereof were never brought to her knowledge. At the trial of the action on Nov. 25, 1893, SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., having heard the evidence, considered that there was no fraud established by the plaintiff, and pronounced in favour of the will of Nov. 9, 1892. From that decision the plaintiff now appealed.

G Wheeler, Q.C., and W. H. Roberts for the plaintiff.
Bargrave Deane for the defendants.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is extremely difficult for us to review a case in which the judge whose decision is appealed from has seen the witnesses himself, and is much better able, therefore, than we are to judge of the evidence. Still, I do not hesitate, on the grounds which I will presently state, to differ from the decision he has come to. [HIS LORDSHIP then discussed the facts of the case, observed that, as to the will of Nov. 7, 1892, he could not see any reason for throwing any suspicion upon it, but that he could not say the same as to the will of Nov. 9, 1892, and proceeded:] But SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in arriving at the conclusion he did, did not address his mind to a rule which is perfectly well established as applicable to cases of this sort, namely, that wherever circumstances exist which excite the suspicion of the court, and whatever their nature may be, it is for those who propound the will as to which the suspicion arises to remove such suspicion or doubt, and to prove affirmatively that the testator knew and approved of the contents of the document. It is only when this is done that the onus is thrown on those who oppose the will to prove fraud or undue influence, or whatever else they rely upon to displace the case made for proving the will.

I will refer to a passage in Barry v. Butlin (1). There PARKE, B., says that the rules of law according to which cases of this nature are to be decided are two, which he proceeds to state as follows :

"The first is, that the onus probandi lies in every case upon the party propounding a will, and he must satisfy the conscience of the court that the instrument so propounded is the last will of a free and capable testator. The second is that, if a party writes or prepares a will under which he takes a benefit, that is a circumstance which ought generally to excite the suspicion of the court, and calls upon it to be vigilant and jealous in examining the evidence in support of the instrument, in favour of which it ought not to pronounce unless the suspicion is removed, and it is judicially satisfied that the paper propounded does express the true will of the deceased."

Similar expressions of opinion are to be found in Fulton v. Andrew (2), where LORD HATHERLEY says that "there is a further onus upon those who take for their own benefit, after having been instrumental in preparing or obtaining a will, and they have thrown upon them the onus of showing the righteousness of the transaction"; and also in Brown v. Fisher (3).

The rule laid down in those cases is not confined to the single case in which a will is prepared by or on the instructions of the person taking a benefit under it, but extends to all cases where, as I have said, there are circumstances which arouse the suspicion of the court. In my opinion, therefore, the judge misdirected himself; he directed himself to the question of fraud, forgetting the well-established rule to which I have referred. I think the appeal must be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If I thought that the judge had directed himself rightly, I should certainly not be disposed to interfere with his decision. There is, to my mind, in this case such "a strong presumption," to use the language of LORD HANNEN in Brown v. Fisher (3), "against the correctness" of the defendants' statements "from all the circumstances of the case," as to the will of Nov. 9, 1892, that I cannot accept them. The law applicable to these cases, as laid down in Barry v. Butlin (1), has been acted upon over and over again. Before we need come to consider the question of fraud alleged by the plaintiff, there is that other onus, which is thrown upon the defendants by the suspiciousness of the case to be disposed of. That onus has not, in my opinion, been satisfied, and I think, therefore, the appeal should be allowed. I entirely agree with the principle of law which has been deduced by LINDLEY, L.J., from Barry v. Butlin (1), Fulton v. Andrew (2), and Brown v. Fisher (3).

DAVEY, L.J.—I entirely agree, and should not wish to say anything were it not that we are differing from the learned judge in the court below. The principle of law laid down in the cases which my brothers have referred to does not apply, as LINDLEY, L.J., has said, merely where the person who has been concerned in the preparing of the will takes a legacy or some benefit under it—as happened in those cases; but it applies to all cases which give rise to a suspicion in the mind of the court. The suspicion which the circumstances of the present case give rise to has not been removed by the defendants, on whom the onus is, and I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

By the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, s. 23 [replaced and substantially re-enacted by s. 62 of the Highways Act, 1959 (39 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 480)]: "Where . . . it appears to the authority which is liable or has undertaken to repair any highway . . . that, having regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, extraordinary expenses have been incurred by such authority in repairing such highway by reason of the damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same, or extraordinary traffic thereon, such authority may recover in a summary manner from any person by whose order such weight or traffic has been conducted the amount of such expenses as may be proved . . . to have been incurred by such authority by reason of the damage arising from such weight or traffic as aforesaid."

Held: the object of the section was not to prohibit extraordinary traffic, but to lay the extra expense of damage done by such traffic to the road on the shoulders of those who caused the damage and to whose benefit it enured; the section distinguished between "excessive weight" and "extraordinary traffic," and so the damage done by extraordinary traffic might differ from that done by "excessive weight"; "extraordinary traffic," as distinct from "excessive weight," was the carriage of articles over the road, at either one or more times, which was so exceptional in the quality or quantity of articles carried, or in the mode or time of user of the road, as substantially to increase the burden imposed by ordinary traffic on the road and to cause damage and expense beyond what is common; the singularity of the articles carried or the singularity of the purpose for which they were carried was not the sole criterion of the applicability of the section.

The respondent, Thomas, was the surveyor of the Pembroke District Highway Board, which district included the parish of Angle, and, as such surveyor, on April 23, 1892, gave the following certificate: D

“To the Pembroke District Highway Board.—I, the undersigned, the surveyor of the above-mentioned authority, hereby certify, in pursuance of the provisions of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, that, having regard to the average expenses of repairing the highway and road called Angle Road in the village and parish of Angle, in the county of Pembroke, situate within the district of such authority, extraordinary expenses amounting to £125 17s. 9d. have been incurred by the said authority in repairing such highway and road, and being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, by reason of the damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same, and extraordinary traffic thereon, conducted by or by the order of Messrs. Hill & Co., of Bury Works, Gosport, and carrying on business at Angle aforesaid, contractors, from Jan. 14, 1890, until and including the month of April, 1892, in consequence of materials used by them in the construction of a battery in the said parish of Angle, and conveyed by them or their order along and over the said highway, by and with their horses and carts, or by and with horses and carts hired by them for the conveyance of such materials.” E

On Sept. 10, 1892, an information and complaint was laid by the surveyor and a summons issued against the appellants for that, from Jan. 14, 1890, until the month of April, 1892, at the parish of Angle, the Pembroke District Highway Board did incur extraordinary expenses in repairing certain highways in the parish of Angle, which roads were within the jurisdiction of the highway board, and that they were liable to repair the same, by reason of damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same, and by extraordinary traffic thereon, which weight and traffic had been conducted by or under the order of the appellants, which expenses amounted to £125 7s. 9d., as appeared by the said certificate, and that the said appellants had refused to pay the same. The proceedings were taken under s. 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878. The road in question was within the said parish, and was a public highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and not a main road, and ran from the seashore at Angle Bay to and beyond a government road, branching thereout at right angles, and leading to the government fort known as “Chapel Bay Fort,” and a road 1,260 yards long, and on an average four yards wide, and was generally called or known as the Angle Road, and was, previously to the appellants’ traffic being brought over it, in fairly good repair suitable to the ordinary traffic thereon. Such ordinary traffic consisted of ordinary agricultural produce and materials, and the conveyance of bricks from an adjacent brick works belonging to and worked by a Mr. Mirehouse, against F

A whom a similar complaint had been preferred in respect also of damage done by him to the Angle Road by the carriage of materials for the construction of a pier, which he was building on the seashore. In January, 1890, Messrs. Hill, the appellants, commenced, under a contract with the government, the construction of a battery for the government at Chapel Bay Fort. Their materials, consisting of shingle and cement, were brought by the appellants to Angle Bay in barges, and
B carted from there over the road in question. The total quantity of such materials was 8,051 tons, carted in 9,000 loads, being a very great addition to the usual total traffic along the same. The appellants carted a small portion of the said building materials with their own horse and cart; the rest of such materials were carted in the local farmers' ordinary agricultural carts, drawn by the farmers' horses, and generally in charge of the farmers' men. During the period from January, 1890,
C to April, 1892, the traffic over the road in question consisted, in addition to that brought on it by the appellants, and to the ordinary agricultural traffic, of the brick traffic of Mr. Mirehouse, and the user of his traction engine and trucks for carting of materials by him for the building of the pier (such carting traversing the whole extent of the road in question), and also of three government guns, intended for the fort, each weighing eighteen tons, drawn by Mr. Mirehouse's traction
D engine, together with heavy gun carriages and slides. It was proved, however, that the traction engine, by reason of the width of its wheels, did no damage to the road. During the said period the road was very considerably cut up, and damaged in an extreme degree. It appeared that, of the total building materials carried over the road in question during the time under consideration, about three-fourths were carried by the appellants and one-fourth by Mr. Mirehouse. The
E respondent gave evidence that the ordinary average expense of the repair of highways in the neighbourhood of the parish of Angle amounted to £6 5s. 10d. per mile, and that of the highways within that parish, which were all called and known by the name of the "Angle Road," and were nine miles in extent, did not exceed the amount of £3 16s. 4d. per mile, and proved that extraordinary expenditure had been incurred in respect of the highway in question, and had been paid for by F the said board, caused by the unusual traffic mentioned, and that such extraordinary expenditure amounted to the sum mentioned in the certificate of the respondent as such surveyor as aforesaid.

The justices excluded from consideration the other traffic hereinbefore mentioned which happened to be coincident in time with the appellants' traffic, and which was alleged to be extraordinary, and a proportionate part (so far as they
G could estimate it) of the damage caused to the highway in question by such other traffic as well as the ordinary wear and tear thereof. They were of opinion on the facts stated, (i) that none of the carts conveying the appellants' materials carried greater weight than those usually carried for agricultural and other purposes in the neighbourhood, and, therefore, that there was no proof before them of excessive weights having been carried over the highway by the appellants otherwise than by H the great increase of carting hereinbefore mentioned, but they regarded the traffic, as being carried on for the unusual purpose of the building of a government fort, as extraordinary, and assessed the extraordinary expenses for which they considered the appellants liable at £105 1s. 7d. and costs; (ii) that the traffic was conducted by order of the appellants and under their control, and that, therefore, they were liable. The Divisional Court allowed the appellants' appeal, and the
I surveyor appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Aug. 10, 1893. BOWEN, L.J., read the following judgment of the court: The most important question we have to consider is the true meaning to be placed on the words "damage caused by extraordinary traffic." We may begin by observing that the object of the section is not to prohibit extraordinary traffic, but to lay the extra expense of damage done by such traffic to the road on the right shoulders, namely, upon those who caused the damage and to whose benefit it ensued. The section, in the second place, distinguishes between "excessive weight" and "extraordinary traffic." The damage done by "extraordinary traffic" may, therefore, in the eyes of the legislature, differ from that done by "excessive weight." Traffic, thirdly, is a nomen collectivum—a collective term, a noun of multitude. It does not, like "excessive weight," apply merely to the cargo carried by a single vehicle; it is large enough to include the continuous or repeated user of the road by various vehicles belonging to one owner. Finally, extraordinary traffic, according to the plain use of language, is traffic which is not of the common order of traffic; and taking all these considerations together, and especially when we remember that the object of the section is to provide for the expense of such extraordinary traffic as does damage to a highway, we shall arrive at the following result, viz., that "extraordinary traffic," as distinct from "excessive weight," will include all such continuous or repeated user of the road by a person's vehicles as is out of the common order of traffic, and as may be calculated to damage the highway and increase the expenditure on its repair.

Why should the singularity of the product carried, or the singularity of the purpose for which it is carried, be the sole criterion of the applicability of a section, the scope of which is what I have said? To confine it in this way would be to deprive the legislation of half its practical value, and arbitrarily to limit it to a few cases of user not a whit more deserving of relief than others. It is true that extraordinary traffic is a traffic to be specifically distinguished from other traffic by the section, but the distinction cannot solely depend on the unusual character of articles carried, but rather on the effect which the carriage of the particular articles—call them by whatever name or classification one will—may presumably be expected to have upon the road. If so, extraordinary traffic is really a carriage of articles over the road, at either one or more times, which is so exceptional in the quality or quantity of articles carried, or in the mode or time of user of the road, as substantially to alter and increase the burden imposed by ordinary traffic on the road, and to cause damage and expense thereby beyond what is common. Under this wider interpretation the section becomes consistent and reasonable. If it be an exceptional user of the highway that really has caused the mischief, why should the relief be given only in cases of articles of an exceptional quality or nature, and not to all exceptional cases whatever which increase the burden of the road, especially when we bear in mind that extraordinary traffic is treated by the Act of Parliament as a different thing from excessive weight, and that the term "extraordinary" is used earlier in the section as applicable to what is unusual in amount.

Let us take some of the obvious instances which (upon such a construction) will fall within the section. A contractor builds a large house, or factory, or church, and by so doing temporarily increases the user of the road in a way that ends by damaging the road itself. Why should he not pay for the extra use of the road? It is argued that he ought not to pay because he is only using the road in a lawful way. If he used it in any other way he would be indictable for a nuisance. But this section of the Act of Parliament, as we have seen, is not intended only to prevent unlawful user; it applies also to damage caused by legitimate and proper user: see per BAGGALLAY, L.J., in Lord Avcland v. Lucas (1).

It is argued that he is only carrying over the road the same substance as that which other people ordinarily carry. Here, again, the answer is that the section is not penal, but remedial and recuperative, and that it is because, though he carries ordinary articles, he does not carry them in the manner or on the limited number of occasions in and on which other people carry them, and because the frequency of his travels over the road has caused the special mischief to the road, that such frequency constitutes in itself a reason why he should pay more than his neighbour. Such an interpretation, which makes the relief commensurate with the

A damage done and places it on the shoulders of the person who actually causes the damage, gets rid of all the minute discussions as to whether the cargo carried is, or is not, of a nature ordinarily carried in the neighbourhood, the nature of the cargo and purpose for which it is carried being matters that may indeed throw light on the user of the road, and thus have a bearing on the question whether the traffic is, or is not, extraordinary, but which do not form any absolute factors in the definition of "extraordinary traffic." It is, however, important to recollect that the section does not mean that a man is to be mulcted merely because he uses a road more than others do, even if it be his own user which has produced the mischief to the road. The traffic must be extraordinary as regards the ordinary user of the road as a whole by all who use it, and not merely large as regards the traffic put on the road by other persons.

C Such is the conclusion as to the meaning of the section at which one would reasonably arrive independently of decided cases. Is there anything in the state of the authorities that tends to a different view? The first case to be noticed is that of Williams v. Davies (2). The defendant had bought timber near a railway station which was conveyed in waggons in sixty-seven loads between Christmas and March. The timber was purchased in the ordinary course of business, but

D the sixty-seven loads of timber were a greater number of timber-loads than usually passed over the roads in question in three consecutive months, and the heavier loads were heavier than the loads of ordinary agricultural produce. The magistrates held that the sixty-seven loads of timber were in the aggregate excessive weight and extraordinary traffic. The Court of Queen's Bench (LUSH and BOWEN, JJ.) held that the justices were right. LUSH, J., said (44 J.P. at p. 348): "What

E the traffic was to be compared with was the ordinary traffic along the road," and the fact that the timber was the natural produce of the land did not prevent the traffic being held as extraordinary. In Lord Aveland v. Lucas (1) all that was determined was that a traction engine, drawing two waggons for the carriage of materials and goods used for ordinary purposes on the estate of the defendant, was not prevented from being extraordinary traffic by the fact that the engine was of

F less weight than was allowed by the Act [s. 28 of the Act of 1878, repealed by Road Traffic Act, 1930], and had its wheels constructed in conformity with the Act. GROVE, J., indeed, thought that the weight and character of the traffic, not the amount of the user to which the road is subjected, was the criterion. This was not necessary for the decision in the case. But LINDLEY, J., considered that the words "extraordinary traffic" meant extraordinary with reference to the ordinary

G use and traffic upon and over the road. In the Court of Appeal the judgment was affirmed, but no expressions were used which in any way directly determine the precise point now in question, except that the court point out (see per BAGGALLAY, L.J.) that the Act of Parliament is intended to apply to cases where the user of the road has been rightful and legitimate.

In Wallington v. Hoskins (3) LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and FIELD, J., held that the traffic was not extraordinary, and affirmed this portion of the finding of the justices. The justices had also found that the weights were excessive, and this portion of their order the court reversed. But the traffic in question consisted in the carriage of stone in heavy loads; with respect to this the justices found that the carriage of stone was an ordinary and recognised industry of the place, and do not appear to have found that it was carried in any unusual manner or quantity, even as regarded the particular roads in question. It is difficult to see that the case in any way governs the present, and LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., adopts the view of LINDLEY, J., in Lord Aveland v. Lucas (1), that "extraordinary" is a term used with reference to the ordinary use and traffic on the road.

I In R. v. Williamson (4) the respondent, who was owner of ironstone mines, sent his traffic to the railway station in carts of the ordinary size and weight, but which made about seventy journeys a day. The other traffic was agricultural and very small. It was held by GROVE and LINDLEY, JJ., that the justices were wrong in finding that the defendant caused extraordinary traffic merely because he had many carts to send. It is not clear that the traffic in question was found by the justices to be anything beyond what the road was accustomed to bear, although the greater portion of the traffic on the road was no doubt produced by the appellant. If the justices had found the traffic caused by the defendant to be beyond the ordinary user of the road, and to have occasioned the damage, their finding, I think, would have been correct, and ought not to have been disturbed. I do not, however, see clearly that the justices did so find. LINDLEY, J., said (45 J.P. at p. 507):

"I am disposed to say that there may be cases where the use of the highway is so frequent and incessant as to amount to extraordinary traffic. . . . Nevertheless, the mere fact that one person uses a highway more than others is no reason for calling it extraordinary traffic on the part of that person."

In Pickering Lythe East Highway Board v. Barry (5) materials for building a house were carried by the defendant over a highway, the ordinary traffic of which was agricultural traffic. For several months carts containing heavy building materials were almost daily on the road, and the weight of the loads was such that the drivers of the carts when going downhill were frequently obliged to adopt exceptional means to take the strain off the horses. Here was a case in which beyond all question the damage done to the highway by the traffic would, according to the view suggested as the proper construction of the Act, have been done by extraordinary traffic. The justices, however, considered that s. 23 of the Act of 1878 did not apply in a case where the damage was caused by an extraordinary quantity of traffic which differed not materially in character, but chiefly in its weight and amount, from the traffic to be expected on the highways, citing the authority of GROVE, J., in Lord Aveland v. Lucas (1). The Queen's Bench Division (GROVE and LOPES, JJ.) refused to disturb their finding. GROVE, J., said (8 Q.B.D. at p. 62):

"The traffic in this case was only a greater amount of the same traffic as was used before on the road."

LOPES, J., said (ibid.):

"I think the legislature intended something unusual in weight, or extraordinary in the kind of traffic, either as compared with what is usually carried over roads of the same nature in the neighbourhood, or as compared with that which the road in its ordinary and fair use may be reasonably subjected to. It would not be sufficient to compare the weight and traffic complained of with traffic usually carried on the particular road; it might be the traffic was usually of the lightest kind, but surely the legislature never intended that a man was not to use the road for carrying materials for building a dwelling-house, farmhouse, or barn, provided he used it in a reasonable way for those purposes."

There is a difficulty in reconciling this language with the decision in Williams v. Davies (2), and it seems to me, with deference, that my brother LOPES assumed without sufficient justification that the object of the legislature was to prevent extraordinary traffic, whereas its only object is to throw on the person who causes such traffic the duty to pay for the damage it does the road. If this is the true view, the question is not what is a reasonable use of the road, but what is its ordinary use. It would seem, therefore, that the decision in the Pickering Case (5) is based on an imperfect view of the Act of Parliament. In Raglan Highway Board v. Monmouth Steam Co. (6) there were large woods which came to maturity in a group of twenty parishes after ten to seventeen years' growth. One or other wood was cut every year, and the timber hauled over one or other highway each winter. The justices found that the traffic was not extraordinary, it being the ordinary trade of the district carried on in the ordinary manner. This decision was affirmed by the Queen's Bench Division (GROVE, LOPES and BOWEN, JJ.). In R. v. Ellis (7) the road was broken down by a traction engine with trucks, which made on several days two journeys a day upon it. It was held by FIELD and

A BOWEN, JJ., that the traffic was extraordinary traffic. In Whitebread v. Seven-oaks Highway Board (8) the expenses were incurred in consequence of stone having been carted by the defendant from a quarry along the road, which was an ordinary country road, used for ordinary light country traffic, and which had never been adapted for, or made up to bear, heavier traffic. Stone traffic was a recognised business in the neighbourhood, but was not the ordinary or recognised traffic of the

B road in question. It was held by MATHEW, J., and my brother A. L. SMITH, J., that the justices were right in finding the traffic to be extraordinary. This case seems to me not to be reconcilable with the decision of GROVE and LOPES, JJ., in Pickering Lythe East Highway Board v. Barry (5), and A. L. SMITH, J., appears to have dissented from the language used by LOPES, J., in the last-mentioned case.

C In this state of the authorities, and in the absence of any decision by the Court of Appeal, it may be assumed that we are entitled to deal with the section upon principle, and it is certainly desirable to lay down for the future some clear and intelligible canon which shall guide the magistrates in their interpretation of the law; and for the reasons given above the true interpretation appears to be that which has been already explained.

D It remains to be considered what is the true effect of the magistrates' finding in this case. The ordinary traffic of the road in question before the respondents' traffic was brought over it consisted of agricultural produce and materials, and the conveyance of bricks from an adjacent brick works by Mr. Mirehouse. In January, 1890, the respondents began to construct a battery at a government fort. Their materials consisted of shingle and cement, which the respondents brought by sea in barges and carted over the road in question. The justices found that the

E total quantity of the materials was a very great addition to the usual total traffic, and that the road was cut up and expenditure incurred in consequence of this unusual traffic. On the facts stated the justices were of opinion that none of the carts conveying the respondents' materials carried greater weights than those usually carried for agricultural and other purposes in the neighbourhood, and, therefore, that there was no proof before them of excessive weights having been

F carried over the highway by the respondents otherwise than by the great increase of carting hereinbefore mentioned, but regarded the traffic, it being carried on for the unusual purpose of the building of a government fort, as extraordinary. If by this the magistrates meant to find, as I rather gather that the Divisional Court believed, that the purpose for which the traffic was called into existence being unusual the traffic must necessarily be extraordinary within the meaning of

G the Act, it would be difficult to justify their decision. But exceptional purposes may have a tendency to produce and may explain and account for exceptional traffic; and in that sense the unusual character of the object may bear on the question of increase of traffic. Taking the Case stated by the justices in its fair and obvious meaning, I think that the justices found, and meant to find, that there was an exceptional increase of traffic produced by a cause which, being itself

H exceptional, explained and accounted for such increase, and that the increase of traffic was one that damaged the road and gave rise to extra expense. This seems to justify their finding that the traffic was extraordinary within the meaning of the Act. Their decision, therefore, appears correct, and the appeal ought to be allowed with costs here and below.

ECKERSLEY AND OTHERS v. MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Davey, L.JJ.), March 16, 1894]

[Reported [1894] 2 Q.B. 667; 71 L.T. 308; 9 R. 827]

Arbitration—Stay of legal proceedings—Arbitrator not independent person—Servant of one party to dispute—Need to show certain bias—Probability of bias.

An agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants contained a clause that all disputes under it should be referred to a servant of the defendants as sole arbitrator. A dispute arose in which the professional skill of the servant's son was in issue, and the plaintiffs began proceedings in which they claimed damages for damage suffered by them as the result of his negligence. On an application by the defendants to stay the proceedings,

Held: (i) the rule that a judge, magistrate, or other person holding a judicial office, must not only not be biased, but also must not act if the circumstances be such that he may be suspected of bias, did not apply to a case where the parties had agreed that a servant of one party should act as arbitrator in the event of disputes arising between them; to justify a stay being refused it must be shown that such an arbitrator would in fact be biased or that there was a probability that he would be biased; the fact that the arbitrator might have to decide questions of the competency of himself or his son was not sufficient to show a probability of bias; and, therefore, there was no reason why the proceedings in question should not be stayed.

- (2) Nuttall v. Manchester Corpn. (1892), 8 T.L.R. 513; 2 Digest (Repl.) 488, 406.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (MATHEW and CAVE, JJ.), affirming an order of the judge at chambers staying proceedings in the action.

By a contract in writing the plaintiffs contracted with the defendants to do excavation work for the purpose of making a new dock at Liverpool. During the progress of the work the defendants were making excavations in a dock, called the Canada Dock, which adjoined the land on which the plaintiffs were working. The work in the Canada Dock was being done under the superintendence of the son of the engineer of the defendants, who was acting as assistant engineer to his father. The plaintiffs alleged that, owing to the negligence or incompetency of the son of the engineer, water escaped from the Canada Dock and flooded the works which were being executed by them (the plaintiffs), so that their work was impeded and their plant damaged.

The contract provided, by cl. 45, that if, in the opinion of the engineer of the defendants, the contractors should fail duly to carry out and perform their contract,

A or to exercise due diligence, and make due progress with the works, the defendants were to have the power to take the works out of their hands and put an end to the contract. Clause 47 provided that, if the contractors should not proceed with the work, or any portion of it, to the engineer's satisfaction, either as regarded materials, plant, or workmen, or the manner in which the work was being done, or the despatch which was being made, or if for any other reason the engineer should be
 B of opinion that it was expedient that any parts or part of the work should be done by the defendants and not by the contractors, then the defendants might, on giving notice signed by the engineer or their solicitor, proceed themselves to execute the work unperformed by the contractors, and recover the expenses which they might incur in or about the exercise of the powers given to them by this clause from the contractors, the amount of such expenses to be ascertained and fixed by the
 C engineer. By cl. 53:

"All disputes and differences of every kind which may arise between the contractors and the Board during the progress, or after the completion, of the works contracted for, in relation to or arising out of any of the plans or drawings, or any of the provisions of the specification or the contract, or in relation D to any of the works, or the payment to be made for the same, or as to the accounts between the Board and the contractors, shall be and the same are hereby referred to the engineer of the Board as sole arbitrator . . . and every award of the engineer shall be finally binding and conclusive upon the parties in relation to the disputes and differences as to which such award is made, and shall not be disputed on any ground whatever."

E The defendants applied, at chambers, for an order staying all proceedings in the action, upon the ground that the action was brought in respect of disputes and differences which came within the arbitration clause. The plaintiffs contended that the claims in the action did not come within the arbitration clause, and that, in any case, the action ought not to be stayed because the engineer, who would be the arbitrator, would probably be biased in favour of the defendants. In the F affidavits filed by the plaintiffs in opposition to the application to stay proceedings, it was stated that the engineer's son hoped to succeed his father as engineer of the dock board, and that the question of the son's appointment had already been discussed by the dock board. The plaintiffs alleged that those facts were not known by them when they entered into the contract. The master made an order staying all proceedings in the action, which was affirmed by the judge at chambers.
 G The Divisional Court (MATHEW and CAVE, JJ.) dismissed the plaintiffs' appeal against that order. The plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and J. A. Hamilton for the plaintiffs.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Bigham, Q.C., Curver, and Llewellyn Davies for the defendants.

H LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs are contractors, and they entered into a contract with the defendants, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, to do certain works within the ambit of the Liverpool Docks. The works were to excavate a certain piece of ground within the ambit of the docks for the purpose of making a new dock, or a new basin, to give some assistance to the Liverpool Docks.

I They entered into a contract, and in that contract was a stipulation that:

"All disputes and differences of every kind which may arise between the contractor and the Board during the progress, or after the completion, of the works contracted for, in relation to or arising out of any of the plans or drawings, or any of the provisions of the specification or contract, or in relation to any of the works, or the payment to be made for the same, or as to the accounts between the Board and the contractors, shall be and the same are hereby referred to the engineer of the Board, as sole arbitrator, with power to make awards from time to time as he may think proper, and with power to make such orders in any such award as to the costs and charges of and attending any such reference, and of the award, as the said engineer shall in his discretion think proper, and every award of the engineer shall be finally binding and conclusive upon the parties in relation to the disputes and differences as to which such award is made."

It seems to me that words cannot be larger, and that they are a submission to arbitration in the cases spoken of.

The plaintiffs allege that certain things were done by the servants of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, not on or within the space which was the subject-matter of the contract, that is to say, the portion of the ground which was to be excavated, but outside it, which caused water to flow into the part which the plaintiffs were excavating. In my opinion all those things are within the submission.

The plaintiffs say that the court ought not to stay the action, because there is sufficient reason why the matter should not be referred to the engineer. What is their ground for saying that? They say that he might be biased in that which he had to do for reasons which they state. They argue that it is sufficient for them to say that he might be biased, although the court should be of opinion that there is no ground for supposing that he would in fact be biased. This, therefore, is an attempt to apply the doctrine which is applied to judges—I do not mean only to judges of the Superior Court, but to all judges—that not only must they not be biased, but, even although it be proved to demonstration that they would not be biased, yet if the circumstances are such that people—not reasonable people, but many people—would suspect them of being biased, they ought not to sit as judges. That is the rule that is applied to judges. Is that a rule which can be applied to such a contract as this, where, as between the contractor and a principal, the parties both agree that the chief servant of one of the parties shall be the arbitrator? If you applied the rule which is applied to judges in such a case as this it is obvious that such a servant, under whose superintendence the work was to be done, never could act as the arbitrator. Some people would suspect that he would be biased in favour of his employers. That cannot be, because the parties have agreed that such a person shall be the arbitrator. Therefore, the allegations must go further, and must go, in my opinion, to the extent that it must be shown, I will not say that he would be biased, but that there is a probability that he would be biased. That seems to me to be distinctly the decision in Jackson v. Barry Rail. Co. (1).

The case relied upon by the plaintiffs is Nuttall v. Manchester Corpn. (2). That case has been discussed since it was decided, and, as I understand it, it has been explained upon the ground, first of all, that there had been a very unseemly dispute between the engineer in that case and the contractor—a personal dispute raising a vindictive feeling—and also that he had expressed an opinion so strongly as to amount to a pre-judgment. If that is the ground of the decision in Nuttall v. Manchester Corpn. (2), that case is to be supported entirely, but it is not in point in this case, because such facts do not exist in this case and are not suggested. If it is said that, according to a reading of the report, which I cannot help thinking is not a full report of what the judges decided, the mere fact of the conduct of the engineer himself being likely, or being sure, to come into question, is sufficient of itself to satisfy the court that there is a reason why the matter should not be referred to him, all I can say is that it seems to be contrary to other cases, and is absolutely contrary to Jackson v. Barry Rail. Co. (1). If that be the right view of the case we ought not to agree with it, and we ought to say that we overrule it.

Therefore it must be shown, at least, that it is probable that the engineer in this case would be biased. What is relied upon by the plaintiffs to show that? It seems to be admitted that, if he had to consider whether he himself had given a negligent order, or whether he himself had given an unskilful order, that would

A not justify the court in saying that he should not be the arbitrator; but we are asked to say so where the very same negligence was committed, or an ill-advised or incompetent order was given, by his son. That involves that we must think that a man of whom nobody could say it was possible that he would act with bias in judging of his own acts, would be probably biased to give a decision which he knew to be wrong in favour of his son. All I can say is that that is a view of human nature which I do not adopt. When we have a man of high character, one whose character for impartiality cannot be impeached when his own conduct is called into question, and I am told that such a man would not have strength of mind and honesty enough to act impartially where his son's conduct is called into question, all I can say is, I do not accept the suggestion. I certainly do not accept it in this case. I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court, of the judge at chambers, and of the master, all of which coincided, cannot be set aside by this court, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts] I am of opinion that the Divisional Court were right, and that the disputes are within the terms of cl. 53.

D The other point is this. It is said that, even assuming this is a dispute within the terms of the contract, still the action ought not to be stayed because the engineer is disqualified, from the nature of the dispute, from acting as arbitrator. It is said that he will have to decide upon the professional competency, not of himself, but of his son; and that it would not be right and proper that he should be called upon to do so and be considered at the same time an impartial arbitrator.

E It is to be observed that the rule to be applied to a case of this kind is entirely different from that which is to be applied to magistrates, or judges, or any persons in a judicial capacity, where the tribunal is not chosen by the persons who are sending their differences to it, but is a tribunal constituted apart from any agreement or any consent on their part. No doubt in cases of that kind the rules are very strict. There is no principle which is better recognised than that a man is not to be a judge in his own cause, and in the case of magistrates it has been held that it is an established principle that, if there is any reason which can be suggested which would affect the minds of ordinary people or induce them to think that there might be any bias, that would be sufficient to render the tribunal incompetent. But that is entirely different to the case which is now before us, where, as I have said, the parties have chosen their own judge, and have agreed that the disputes are to be referred to the engineer as sole arbitrator.

G It is of the essence of the submission that questions are to be submitted to this engineer, as arbitrator, which must involve matters connected with his own competency, with his own care, with his own caution, and with the way in which he may have discharged the duties which belonged to him under this contract.

H The parties agree that the arbitrator is to adjudicate on matters in which he has an interest. Further than that, I understand it was admitted and was not disputed at the Bar that, if the matter in question here were a matter which involved the professional competency or the professional skill of the engineer himself, he would not be disqualified. What is the additional fact in this case? What is there to distinguish it from a case where his own professional competency is involved?

I Simply that he would have to decide upon the professional competency of his son, instead of upon his own. It appears to me that that can make no substantial difference upon which this court ought to act. I am unable to say that that raises in my mind any reasonable probability of any partiality on his part. The master before whom the matter came arrived at that conclusion; the judge before whom this matter came confirmed that view; the Divisional Court acted in the same way, and I am glad to think that here we are able to give effect to the discretion which has been exercised by those tribunals. I think, therefore, this appeal fails.

DAVEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Upon the first point, I think that the dispute, when one thoroughly understands the facts and the contentions of the parties, is one which is thoroughly within the arbitration clause. Upon the other point I confess I have had more doubt; but, upon consideration, I must say I do not think there are sufficient circumstances to make it right in the present case to deprive the defendants of the benefit of the provision in the contract for arbitration. No doubt, in a certain sense, the engineer will be the judge of his own conduct, and no doubt that is a position which prima facie raises some surprise in a judicial mind; but that is the contract of the parties. The parties have contracted that the servant of one of them shall be the arbitrator, and it appears to me that they have contracted that he shall be the arbitrator in cases which necessarily involve the correctness of his own opinion, the competency of his advice and opinion as engineer, and the regularity of his own proceedings.

It is sufficient for that purpose to refer to cl. 45 of the contract, which provides that, if the contractors, in the opinion of the engineer, fail in the performance of any part of the undertaking, the defendants may take the works out of their hands, and put an end to the contract. Suppose the engineer had been of opinion that the contractors had failed in the due performance of their contract, and the defendants had taken the works out of their hands, it could not be suggested that that did not fall within cl. 53, and yet the question in dispute would be whether the opinion of the engineer that the contractors had failed in due performance was well founded or not under the circumstances. The same observation must be made upon cl. 47, which provides that, if the contractors do not proceed with the work, or any portion of it, to the engineer's satisfaction, either as regards materials, plant, or workmen, or the manner in which the same is being done, or the despatch which is being made, or if for any other reason the engineer shall be of opinion that it is expedient that any part or parts of the works should be done by the defendants, and not by the contractors, then he is to take the works out of their hands, and he is to assess the amount of compensation payable to the board.

In all those cases it is perfectly obvious that the parties did contemplate and intend that the engineer, notwithstanding the interest he would have in the subject-matter in dispute, should be the tribunal by which the disputes between the parties should be settled. It is, therefore, not, in my opinion, any objection to the engineer acting in this dispute that his conduct, or the conduct of his son as assistant engineer in directing the other works done in the Canada Dock, would be or might be called in question. It must have been within the contemplation of the parties that the engineer might have to superintend other works undertaken by the defendants during the progress of the contract works, and it seems to me to be an objection which the contractors waived and deprived themselves of the right to insist on when they agreed that the engineer should be the sole arbitrator as regards themselves.

I have only to add that I think that the suggestion that, although he might be trusted on a question concerning his own professional skill, he cannot be trusted on a question concerning his son's professional skill, is one which the court ought not to entertain. I am therefore of opinion that, having regard to the nature of the contract, we cannot disturb the order of the court below.

IVES AND BARKER v. WILLANS

42 W.R. 483; 10 T.L.R. 439; 38 Sol. Jo. 417; 7 R. 243]

Arbitration—Stay of legal proceedings—“Step in the proceedings”—Notice requiring plaintiff to deliver statement of claim.

A “step in the proceedings” within s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889 [now s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1950], means the taking out of a summons or making some application to the court. Accordingly, where the defendant in an action for breach of contract gave the plaintiffs notice in writing requiring them to deliver a statement of claim (thus enabling him definitely to ascertain what disputes raised in the action were within the submission clause in the contract and what were not and to elect whether to allow the proceedings to continue or to apply for a stay under s. 4),

Held: the defendant had not taken any step in the proceedings within s. 4, and a stay of the action would be granted.

Arbitration—Arbitrator—Bias—Construction contract—Engineers of undertakers appointed arbitrators—Previous expression of opinion on matters in dispute.

The fact that the arbitrators named in a contract for the execution of construction works are the engineers of the persons for whose undertaking the works contracted for are being done, or the fact that they have previously expressed an opinion as to some of the matters in dispute, does not, in the absence of evidence of fraud or collusion, render them unfit to act as arbitrators.

Arbitration—Stay of legal proceedings—Matters agreed to be referred mixed in action with matters not so referred—Stay as to matters referred.

If matters which are agreed to be referred are mixed in an action with matters not agreed to be referred there is no reason why a stay of the action should not be granted to apply to those matters which have been agreed to be referred, leaving the action to go on as to the other matters.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., on a summons by the defendant to stay the proceedings under s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

On July 22, 1889, the defendant, John William Willans, entered into a contract with the Liverpool Overhead Rail. Co. for the construction of a high-level railway. B
The contract contained the following clauses :

"4. The works shall be executed in compliance with the provisions hereinafter contained, and with the best materials and workmanship, and in the most workmanlike manner, and to the satisfaction in all respects of the company's engineers for the time being, and of the inspecting officer of the Board of Trade. . . . 37. If any question, difference, or dispute shall arise between the company and the contractor touching the construction or meaning of anything contained in these presents or in the said specification, plans, or sections, or any of them, or as to any works, plant, material, matters, or things, which the company shall require the contractor to execute, do, or supply under or by virtue of these presents, or as to any extra, or additional, or supplemental D works which may be so ordered by the engineers as aforesaid, or as to the price to be paid by the company and the contractor for the same or any of them, or as to any matter of account between the company and the contractor, or as to any moneys alleged to be payable by the company to the contractor, or by the contractor to the company, or as to the rights, duties, liabilities, or obligations of either party under or by virtue of these presents, or as to any E other matter or thing in any way arising out of or relating to the premises, the matter or difference shall be referred to the engineers, whose decision thereon shall be final and conclusive on both parties, and neither of the parties hereto shall commence or prosecute any action against the other of them touching any of the matters aforesaid, unless and until the matter in difference shall have previously been submitted to the engineers for their decision, and the engineers shall have refused or wilfully neglected for the space of one month after service upon them of notice in writing requiring them so to do to adjudicate thereon."

On Aug. 24, 1889, the defendant entered into a sub-contract with the plaintiffs, Ives and Barker, for the erection and fitting up by them of the work required for the railway. The material provisions of the sub-contract were as follows : G

"Whereas by an agreement (hereinafter called the principal agreement), a copy of which, and of the specification of works scheduled thereto, has for the purpose of identification been signed by or on behalf of the parties hereto, and is intended to be hereunto annexed, the contractor has contracted with the said Liverpool Overhead Rail. Co. to construct, so far as described in the principal agreement, an overhead high-level railway. And whereas the erection, painting, and tarring, comprising the setting out, carting, and putting together, rivetting, erecting, painting, and tarring of the wrought and cast iron work, steel, and other work mentioned in the schedule hereto form part of the work which by the principal agreement the contractor has undertaken to provide or do. . . . Now, these presents witness that it is hereby agreed between the parties hereto as follows :—1. The sub-contractors shall for the contractor, at their own cost, by their own workmen, appliances, shops, plant, staging, tools, and power, and in such manner, times, and by such tools, appliances, etc., as shall be determined or approved by engineers and the contractor and in accordance in all respects with the requirements of the principal agreement and of the specification of works therein referred to, so far as they respectively apply to the works of the description now in question, set out all the foundations, also take to all the wrought and cast ironwork, steel, and other work H

A and materials therefor mentioned in the schedule hereto at the stations in Liverpool, as such are delivered from the manufacturers in accordance with their drawings, specification and contract, load up, cart, unload, stack, set out, level, put together, rhymer, drill, punch, as is reasonably necessary in this work, close up, fit and rivet together where and as required, erect, fix and rivet in place, test, paint, tar, and finish the same complete, finding at their own cost the paint and tar as specified, for the net price of 23s. (twenty-three shillings) per net ton of finished work mentioned in the schedule. . . . 3. The sub-contractors shall, unless otherwise instructed by the contractor in writing, put together and rivet up the girders and flooring of all the plates, girder spans, and the other girders, flooring and work, as far as is possible, in the shops to be provided by them, that the work may be proceeded with satisfactorily and continuously day and night, if so required, and shall convey the same to the place of erection. . . . Care will be taken to have the work made at the manufacturers' works in such a way as to make all the parts as accurate and as nearly interchangeable as is reasonably possible in such work, and any suggestions on these points from the sub-contractors will have consideration, but it is understood that subject to such care the sub-contractors take to the work as delivered by the manufacturers at Liverpool, and at their own cost correct and adjust any ordinary imperfection of workmanship, the intention being that under this contract the sub-contractors shall take the work as and in the condition in which it is delivered by the manufacturers ready for erecting according to specification, the method of manufacture and the condition in which the work is to be delivered being at this time known to them.

E . . . 9. All questions arising from this agreement shall be settled by the engineers in the manner mentioned in the principal agreement, and the arbitration clauses contained in the principal agreement shall be treated as being herein repeated with the substitution only of the names of the contractor and sub-contractors for those of the company and the contractor."

F On July 1, 1893, the plaintiffs issued the writ in this action against the defendant, claiming specific performance of the sub-contract and damages for alleged breach thereof. The defendant appeared to the action, and, at the time of entering appearance, gave the plaintiffs notice in writing requiring a statement of claim to be delivered. On July 20, 1893, the defendant took out the summons, asking that, pursuant to s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, all further proceedings in the action might be stayed on the ground that the matters in difference had been agreed to be referred to arbitration, and that he, the defendant, was ready and willing to submit to arbitration. On Nov. 3, 1893, the summons came on to be heard before KEKEWICH, J., when his Lordship decided that the request by the defendant that a statement of claim might be delivered was not a "step in the proceedings" within the meaning of s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, but that there must be some application to the court by summons or motion to constitute a step in the proceedings: see [1894] 1 Ch. 68. Accordingly, he made an order, staying all proceedings in the action, except as to certain claims in respect of matters which were outside the submission to arbitration. The plaintiffs now appealed.

I Renshaw, Q.C., and A. F. Peterson for the plaintiffs.
Warmington, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis for the defendant.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., staying proceedings in this action, and in fact and in substance referring the matters in dispute to arbitration, the order being made under s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. An application was made by the defendant, and the appeal is by the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs' grounds for appealing, now that we have heard them, are reduced to three. First of all, they say that the application to stay was too late, because the defendant had taken a step in the action. The other grounds of complaint go to what I may call the merits of the case. The plaintiffs attack the fairness of the arbitrators; that is their second head. Their third head is that, inasmuch as the whole of the action is not referred to the arbitrators, no part of it ought to be referred by the court in the exercise of its discretion.

By s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889 :

"If any party to a submission . . . commences any legal proceedings in any court against any other party to the submission . . . in respect of any matter agreed to be referred, any party to such legal proceedings may at any time after appearance, and before delivering any pleadings or taking any other steps in the proceedings, apply to that court to stay the proceedings, and that court or a judge thereof, if satisfied that there is no sufficient reason why the matter should not be referred in accordance with the submission, and that the applicant was, at the time when the proceedings were commenced, and still remains, ready and willing to do all things necessary to the proper conduct of the arbitration, may make an order staying the proceedings."

As to the first point about the applicant being too late, the facts are these. The plaintiffs issued their writ against the defendant; the defendant entered appearance; by the præcipe and by the formal document he required a statement of claim. That was contemporaneous with the entry of the appearance. Then he wrote a letter to the plaintiffs' solicitors saying that he should desire a statement of claim. That is all he did. He took no other steps—if those are steps—before he made the present application for a stay under the section to which I have referred. The contention on the part of the plaintiffs is that the defendant is too late because he asked for or gave notice that he would require a statement of claim. That is said to be the taking of a step in the proceedings. The language of the section requires a little attention. It is quite obvious that the step to be taken must be a step taken by the applicant. The section does not say before any pleadings are delivered by anybody or any step is taken by anybody; but that the party applying before delivery of the pleadings—that is, before he delivers pleadings or takes any other steps in the proceedings—may apply. The question we have to consider, therefore, is narrowed down to whether a request by one party to another to take a step is taking a step himself. That is what the defendant did. He asked the plaintiffs to take a step, viz., to deliver a statement of claim. I cannot say that the defendant was taking a step in these proceedings which precludes him from making the present application. I do not think that it would be good sense if we held the contrary, because what did the defendant do?

Addressing myself to the substance of the case I find that he was served with a writ, and the writ showed him that there was a claim for breach of contract. That he knew the contract I do not doubt; but he did not know from the writ what the particular breaches were in respect of which the plaintiffs were suing him, and, until he did know that at all events, how was he to form an opinion whether it would be desirable to apply or not? He had not the materials before him to enable him to exercise his judgment in the matter. It appears to me, therefore, that we should be doing an injustice to a defendant if we said that he must apply under the section before he knows what the plaintiff is suing him for. Quite apart, therefore, from the case not being within the words, I do not think that it is within the spirit or the sense of the Act. Before a man can make up his mind as to which of the alternatives he intends to take, he ought to know what the alternatives are, and ought to be in a position to exercise some kind of judgment in the matter. If we were to hold that the defendant ought to apply, and was too late, we should be saying that he should do that before he knew what to apply for. I think, therefore, that the decision of the learned judge in the court below was right on that part of the case. I think that the authorities establish, that a step in the proceedings means some application to the court or something of that nature, and not talk between solicitors or solicitors' clerks, nor the writing of

A letters, but the taking of some step, such as issuing a summons or something of the kind which is, in the technical sense, a step in the proceedings.

I pass to the second point. That point, as I have already said, goes to the merits. It is an attack on these arbitrators. In order to deal with that point it is of the utmost importance that we should see what is the agreement between the parties which is comprised in what is called the sub-contract of Aug. 24, 1889, made between Willans the defendant, and the plaintiffs Ives and Barker. The sub-contract refers to a principal contract of an earlier date, namely, July 29, 1889. It is impossible to understand the sub-contract without looking at the principal contract. The principal contract is for the construction of the Liverpool Overhead Railway, and it is made between the Liverpool Overhead Rail. Co., of the one part, and Willans, the contractor, of the other part, and by that principal contract Willans contracted to make the Overhead Railway. [His LORDSHIP read the material clauses of the contract of July 22, 1889, and continued:] That is a very tight-fitting bond, and one is surprised at first that any contractor should submit to be bound so tightly, because we know perfectly well that a dispute between the contractor and the company is in substance in this kind of business a dispute between the contractor and the company's engineers, whose business it is to see that the works are done for the company according to the agreement and the plans and specifications. So the real agreement between the contractor and the company is that, if there is any dispute between them, although the engineers are to tell the contractor what to do, and order him to do what they like consistently with the agreement, their decision must be final.

What is the business explanation of that? How does it happen that a contractor will agree to be bound by such a very stringent provision? The explanation of it is to be found in two circumstances. First of all, competition for this kind of work is very keen, and contractors compete with each other, and it has been ascertained by long experience that engineers of the highest character may be trusted. The sub-contract arose in this way. Willans agreed to make the works in question, but he found it necessary to enter into sub-contracts with other people, as in this particular case, not to make the things, but to put together the things which were made. The sub-contract with which we have to deal, and which was entered into between Ives and Barker, of the one part, and Willans, of the other, refers to the original contract. [His LORDSHIP read the provisions of the sub-contract, and continued:] Pausing there, let us see what that agreement really amounts to. What is it that the sub-contractors agree to when they sign and enter into that sub-contract? They agree to be bound in all disputes between them and the contractor, that is, Willans, by the decision of the engineers of the company. They knew the arbitration clauses contained in the original contract, and they knew what the duties of those engineers were, and they knew that among other duties was that of passing or rejecting the materials. The sub-contractors agreed to put up the materials which were to be supplied, relying upon the honour and character of the engineers to reject such as were unfit, and they were willing, as the contractor himself was willing, to submit any difference between them and the company—which indirectly is really a difference between them and the engineers—to the arbitration of those engineers themselves. That is what was contemplated and that was the substance of the bargain.

If that is so, what must the sub-contractors not only allege, but prove, in order to make out that, in a dispute between them and Willans, the contractor, these engineers as arbitrators are not proper persons to decide that dispute? It is obvious that they must prove a great deal more than that the engineers have formed an opinion already upon the subject of the dispute. It is obvious that they must prove a great deal more than that there is a difference of opinion, and that they must give way to the decision. They must attack the character of the engineers to such an extent and in such a manner as to show that the engineers will probably be guilty of some misconduct in the matter of the arbitration—that they will not act fairly. That is what it must come to. Having chosen to put themselves in that condition they cannot complain of the legitimate consequence, but they can complain of the illegitimate consequence. If it were true that these engineers were in collusion with the contractor so as to act unfairly, or so as to lead the court to suppose that they would act unfairly, there would be some ground for saying that this arbitration clause ought not to be enforced. But there is no evidence which deserves serious consideration so far as collusion is concerned. A

It is said that the contractor and engineers have precluded themselves from acting justly, because they have already passed improper materials. If there was any reason whatever to suppose that the engineers had passed materials which they knew and believed were unfit that would be a very serious charge indeed. But the charge does not come up to that, or anything like it. The charge is put in this way: "We, the sub-contractors, complained to you that some girders and other things were unfit; you treated our complaint as frivolous." What does that mean? It means that the engineers did not think they were unfit. That is precisely one of the very things which the sub-contractors contemplated and agreed to submit to. It was the engineers' duty to exercise their own judgment, and any difference of opinion must of course be accepted. The sub-contractors must go far beyond that in order to convince the court that these engineers are not men who ought to be trusted after the trust and confidence which has been put in them deliberately by the sub-contractors themselves. That part of the case seems to me to break down almost, if not quite, as conclusively as the part relating to the suggestion of collusion and impropriety. B C D

The third point is this: It is said that the language of s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, only gives the court power to stay. The language is that the court, if satisfied that there is no sufficient reason why the matter should not be referred, may make an order staying the proceedings. It is said that, inasmuch as the whole of the controversy between the parties cannot be referred to arbitration, there is no sufficient reason for referring anything. It is all or none—and the case which was cited of Turnock v. Sartoris (1), it is said, goes to support that view. That which is to be referred under s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, are matters which are agreed to be referred, and if matters which are agreed to be referred are mixed in an action with matters not agreed to be referred, there is no reason why s. 4 should not be applied to those matters which have been agreed to be referred, leaving the action to go on as to the other matters. But I quite see that, if the matters agreed to be referred were not the main matters in dispute, but formed a subordinate part and trifling part, and if the matters not agreed to be referred were the main matters in dispute, it would be very inconvenient, to say the least of it, to refer that small part, and let the action go on as to the large part. That is what occurred in Turnock v. Sartoris (1), but that is not the case here. The position is reversed. The great controversy is as to the matters which have been referred, and the matters which have not been referred are comparatively small. I see no reason why those matters which have been referred should not be referred, and the action go on as to the rest if it is found worth while to go on with them. Accordingly, I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the learned judge in the court below was right, and must be affirmed; and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs. E F G H

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point made is, that this application is too late under s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and the real question raised is whether or not asking for a statement of claim is a step in the proceedings within the meaning of that section. I am clearly of opinion that it is not. In this case the writ was issued for breach of contract and for damages, and the defendant entered an appearance and simultaneously asked for a statement of claim. The words of the section are to be looked at. The section says that, if any party to a submission commences any legal proceedings in any court against any other party to the submission—then come these words, "in respect of any matter agreed to be referred." These words "in respect of any matter agreed to be referred" appear to me to be important, because I think that all that the I

A defendant here did was this. He had a statement of claim before him of a very general kind, and he naturally said: "There is a submission in respect of certain matters which were agreed to be referred, and when I look at this statement of claim I find it is very general indeed, and I cannot tell how much of this cause of action, how much of the claim in dispute, comes within this submission to refer, and how much, on the other hand, is without it." For that purpose he
B applied for a statement of claim in order thereby more definitely to ascertain for himself what was within the submission and what might be without it, in order that when he knew that, he might then elect what he should do—whether, in point of fact, he should do that which would be a step in the action, or whether he should forbear. I do not think that an application of that kind for a statement of claim is a "step in the proceedings" within the meaning of the section.
C Therefore I am of opinion that the learned judge in the court below was perfectly right in the view which he took on that part of the case.

Another and important part of the case is this. It is said that these engineers as arbitrators are not to be trusted, and it is submitted that the arbitration should not be allowed to proceed. It must be borne in mind that these are not arbitrators in the ordinary sense of the word. They are arbitrators chosen and
D selected by the parties, selected with the knowledge that to some extent they must have an interest in the direction of their employers. It is well known they must have it, and I think the words of BOWEN, L.J., in Jackson v. Barry Rail. Co. (2), at the commencement of his judgment, are highly instructive as to what the position of engineers or arbitrators is in a case like the present: Every word of that judgment appears to me to apply to the present case.

E I will deal shortly with the two main attacks which are made against these engineers and arbitrators. I think the chief one is this. It is said that they are not fit to be trusted because they have prejudged a certain question with regard to the action, namely, the quality and fitness of certain materials. The answer to that, to my mind, is, that the parties perfectly well knew, when they consented that these engineers should be arbitrators, and that difficulties such
F as these which are now suggested might arise—they perfectly well knew that these engineers were the persons who were to determine the quality and character of the materials in question. They knew that these engineers had that to do as well as to act as arbitrators in what is termed the larger arbitration. Knowing that, they agreed that they would accept them as arbitrators, and it appears to me that they cannot now turn round and say that, because the engineers' judgment
G is erroneous, therefore they are not bound to accept it. They agreed to be bound by the engineers' judgment, however erroneous it might be, provided it was honest, and provided it was not tainted with fraud or with misconduct. So far as I can gather, it cannot be suggested that the engineers have acted fraudulently; nor can I find any evidence of any misconduct on their part. If it could have been made out that the engineers, perfectly well knowing that these materials were
H improper, passed them, that, to my mind, would have been strong ground for assenting to the application which the plaintiffs are now making. But there is nothing of the kind. I say that that is no ground whatever, having regard to the peculiar nature of this arbitration, for stopping the arbitration.

Another ground is made, which is this. It is said that the arbitrators could not behave properly because a question of their competency may be involved. I
I think that that is entirely disposed of by Eckersley v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (3). Another attack is made upon them on the ground of collusion. It is said that the engineers and the defendant are acting in collusion. All I can say with regard to that, is that that charge is so wild and so vague, and that in respect of it there is so little that is conclusive, that I desire to adopt the view that they have acted not at all in that way; I think, therefore, that that ground fails also. In my opinion, therefore, the decision of the learned judge in the court below was right, and I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

KAY, L.J.—I also agree with the decision of the learned judge in the court below, and I agree entirely with the judgments that have been pronounced in this court, particularly with the very careful judgment of LINDLEY, L.J., and I should say nothing in the matter only that I think it involves some very important questions to which I can hardly be contented to give my silent assent. A

As to the first question, whether requiring a statement of claim is taking a step in the action within the meaning of s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, I am very clearly of opinion that it is not, for the reasons which have already been given, and particularly for this reason. When a writ has been issued, however carefully it is endorsed, it may very well be that the defendant who is sued may not completely understand from the writ what the entire scope of the action is. The argument on behalf of the plaintiffs on the point—and I agree with that argument—is, that the defendant has to exercise an election whether he will allow the action to go on or avail himself of an arbitration clause like that in the agreement now before us, and apply to the court to stay the action. But it is essential to every case of election that a person who is put to election shall thoroughly understand the facts which make it necessary for him to elect. In this case what the defendant did was, in the first instance, to require that a statement of claim should be delivered. He did so simultaneously with giving notice of his having entered an appearance in the action. But he did not wait till the statement of claim was delivered. On the contrary, he withdrew that notice, and then gave this notice of motion to stay proceedings under the arbitration clause. He applied, as I understand, to stay all the proceedings in this action. When the scope of the action became apparent upon the argument of the case it was found that he did not thoroughly understand what the scope and extent of this action was, and he included in his motion to stay a part of the action which referred to a matter which was outside the agreement containing the clause of arbitration. Nothing could show more clearly how improper it would be to say that requiring a statement of claim which would show him what the scope of the action was more clearly and definitely than he could make out from the writ would be the taking by him of such a step in the action as would debar him from exercising the election which he ought only to be bound to exercise when he thoroughly understands what the nature of the action against him is. I, therefore, think that the learned judge in the court below on that point was entirely right in deciding that it was not a step in the action within the meaning of s. 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. B C D E F

The other points are of vastly more importance. It seems to be a custom now that in large contracts of this kind the engineers who are employed to watch the contractors on behalf of the company which is undertaking the work should be named as the arbitrators between the employers and the contractors if a dispute should arise. One can see, and the course of decisions of late years in this court has shown it, that that must lead now and then to questions of difficulty between the two contracting parties. To make the engineers, who are employed by the persons who engage the contractors to do the work, the arbitrators of every question that arises between the two contracting parties must put those engineers sometimes into a very difficult position indeed. But, as men of business in this court, we have to deal with the practice which has become almost inveterate, constantly done, and is a thing which contractors and employers thoroughly understand, which they are entirely accustomed to, and which nothing that we can say would in the least alter or stop. G H I

What is the course which this court ought to take as a matter of business in questions of this kind? Here is this kind of practice, thoroughly understood, introduced, and acted on from day to day, and contractors who enter into contracts of this kind know very well that the engineers are put into a position which makes them for some purposes not the most proper arbitrators that could be selected. They know perfectly well that the engineers are employed by the other party to the contract, that they have to watch the work that is done, that

A they have, as is quite usual in contracts of this kind, and to determine whether the materials are good or not, and whether the work is or is not properly done. They know that any question that arose between the two contracting parties would probably be a question which the engineers in the course of their employment as engineers would already have had before them and have had to consider and to form some judgment upon. With that knowledge the contractor agrees

B that the engineers shall be the persons whose decision upon questions that arise between him and his employers shall be absolutely final; that they shall be put into the position of arbitrators and judges from whom there is no appeal whatever. I have no doubt that that is done for the reasons already indicated by LINDLEY, L.J., mainly. I think, because engineers who are put into that kind of position are persons of known integrity, far above any suspicion of improper dealing, and

C the contractor is content to be bound by the decision of arbitrators who are in a position of very considerable difficulty. Also I daresay the other motive which LINDLEY, L.J., referred to has much to do with the matter, namely, that competition is so keen that railway companies and great employers of labour and other persons who have large works to put into the hands of contractors find that they have no difficulty in obtaining contractors who are willing to submit

D to such terms.

In the present case there has been, first of all, the faintest possible suggestion, not supported by an atom of anything like proof, of collusion between the engineers, who are celebrated men, and the defendant to this action, who was the original contractor, the plaintiffs being the sub-contractors. I disregard entirely the suggestion that has been made upon that point, because I do not think it comes

E to more than a mere suggestion, and I think that there would be the greatest possible danger of involving persons who employ contractors in interminable litigation if an arbitration clause of this kind could be set aside upon a mere suggestion such as that which I am now dealing with. I think that that is entirely out of the question, and I am sorry that upon such very insufficient materials any such suggestion should have been made. The most material thing

F that strikes my mind which has been put forward in order to show that the engineers are not proper arbitrators in this case is this. It is said—and although no particular instance is given, the evidence is supported in a way I will indicate in a moment—that these engineers have in the exercise of their duty as engineers approved and passed various materials in iron which the sub-contractors by the terms of their sub-contract were bound to put together in order to construct this

G overhead railway in Liverpool, the subject of the contract. It is said that, having already approved these materials, they are the last persons in the world who should be made arbitrators in a question as to whether the materials were good or not.

That, I confess, struck me as being the strongest point that was made by the plaintiffs in this case, and they confirmed their evidence on that point by specifying

H the dates of letters which they had written to the engineers complaining of the quality of some of the iron materials furnished. Besides that, they said that they had in innumerable instances made verbal representations to the same effect, but that all these representations had been treated by the engineers as frivolous, that is to say that the engineers had in each one of these instances exercised their judgment against the plaintiffs, and in such a manner as to make them

I most unfair arbitrators in a question as to the sufficiency of those materials which they had already approved and passed. But one must look back at the contract, and I find on looking back at the contract that it seems to have this effect. In the original contract the materials for the construction of this railway were to be such as the engineers should approve, and their approval was made by the terms of the contract between the contracting parties, the company who are forming this railway and Willans, the defendant in this action, sufficient and conclusive. So that, in the absence of mala fides, if the engineers approved the materials there was an end of the matter, and the contractor was entirely bound by that approval. A

In the sub-contract the original contract to that extent is adopted, and the sub-contractors, who had not furnished any materials themselves, but had only to put together the materials which were furnished to them, took these materials from Willans, the person with whom they contracted, upon the terms of the original contract, namely, that they were to be materials which the engineers had approved as between Willans and the company. Therefore, again, as between Ives and Willans, the approval by the engineers of the quality of the materials is to be a binding thing. Supposing the question were attempted to be raised before the arbitrators, who are third persons altogether, whether the materials were good or not, and it was proved in the absence of mala fides or misconduct that the engineers had approved and passed these materials, I think that the judge would not go behind their approval for a moment. I think that the judge would say that, according to the contract, that is to be sufficient evidence that the materials were proper and right, and no judge and no arbitrator would allow evidence in the absence of some suspicion of mala fides or misconduct to show that that approval of the engineers was at all improper, and that the materials, notwithstanding that approval, were not good and sufficient. That is one answer. The other answer is that these parties with their eyes open entered into this contract; they agreed that the engineers' approval of the materials should be sufficient as between the contracting parties; and they agreed that in any question that arose which was submitted to arbitration those engineers should be the arbitrators. After that agreement they turn round and say: "We cannot prove that you have acted dishonestly; we can only say that you approved of the materials, and we allege that those materials were not good notwithstanding your approval, and therefore that you cannot properly sit as arbitrators." That is not fulfilling the obligation which is incumbent upon them, namely, to make out that those arbitrators—to use the language of LORD ESHER, M.R., in Eckersley v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (3)—will be so biased when they come to exercise their duty as arbitrators that they are unfit to sit in that position. I think that that is not made out, even upon that argument which seems to me the very strongest that was used on behalf of the plaintiffs in this case in order to show that the arbitrators were not proper arbitrators to decide the question between the two parties. B C D E F

With respect to the rest of the case I have very little to add. It is said that there is sufficient reason for not allowing this arbitration to go on in the fact that the action has proceeded as to a very small part of it. I agree entirely with the observations that have been made, and I have no doubt that that is a matter which the court should regard. But looking at how much of this action is allowed to go on, and seeing what a very small part indeed it is of the questions which have been raised between the parties, and seeing that it relates merely to a comparatively small question which was not included in the agreement which contains this arbitration clause, I do not think that there is sufficient reason here on that ground to prevent the arbitration going on. On the whole, though I feel very much impressed by the difficulty of the position in which these arbitrators are placed by reason of their being both arbitrators and engineers of the company which is forming this overhead railway, I do not think that a sufficient case has been made out for allowing the action to go on. I think the learned judge in the court below was right in the conclusion at which he arrived. Therefore, I think that this appeal should be dismissed with costs. G H I

LONG v. CLARKE AND ANOTHER

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.J.J.), November 16, 1893]

A landlord, in distraining for rent, may not break into any building, including a house, stable or barn, but he may enter through any open door or open window, or through a hole in a wall, and he may lift a window which is partly open. Having so entered, he may break open inner doors. He may walk over a garden or park for the purpose of entering the building, and may climb over a wall.

Appeal by the plaintiff, the tenant, from a decision of HENN COLLINS, J., at the trial without a jury in Middlesex, dismissing his action to recover damages for trespass to goods which had been seized as a distress for rent.

The defendant Clarke was the landlord of a house in Gower Street which was let to a tenant. Rent being in arrear, Clarke employed the defendant Hawkins as his bailiff to distrain. The defendant Hawkins went through the house next to the tenant's house into the back yard. This back yard was separated from the back yard of the tenant's house by a wall about five feet high. The bailiff got over this wall by means of a ladder, and so got into the back yard of the tenant's house, and then entered the house through an open window, and distrained upon the goods in the house. The bailiff distrained upon goods belonging to the plaintiff which were in the house, and the plaintiff brought this action to recover damages, alleging that the entry was illegal, and that the landlord and his bailiff were, therefore, trespassers. At the trial before HENN COLLINS, J., without a jury, the learned judge held that the entry was not illegal, and gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—This is a case in which a landlord distrained upon goods which were in a house. A

What is the law relating to distress for rent? The law of distress gives to a landlord, to whom rent is due, the right to do things which if done by any other person would be a trespass. When doing those things, a landlord commits no trespass. If the landlord only does that which he is entitled to do, he does not commit a trespass. The question, then, in this case is whether that which the landlord has done is within that which is permitted by the law relating to a distress by a landlord. When a landlord goes into a house to distrain, whether the door is open or shut, he does that which, if done by any other person, would be a trespass. If the landlord gets into the house in a way which is justified by the law of distress, he may then break open any inner doors. If a landlord walks across his tenant's land up to the front door of the house and walks in, that is no trespass on the part of the landlord. The sole question in this case is, therefore, what is the law as to the right of a landlord to enter and distrain. From the beginning of time, as far as I can see, a landlord has had no right to go into a house or building to distrain by breaking into the house or building. If he can get into the house or building without breaking into it, he can go in for the purpose of distraining, and does not commit a trespass. How has that rule been applied? D The only ordinary way of getting into a house is through the door, but it has been held that a landlord may enter through a window if he can do so without breaking. If, therefore, a landlord can get in through a door or open window he enters without breaking and commits no trespass in law, because he did not break into the building.

It has been argued that, because something has been said long ago about entering per ostia et fenestras, if a landlord found a hole in the wall of a building, he would not be entitled to enter through it to distrain. Why not? If a tenant is altering the house by putting in a bow window instead of a flat one, and, while the work is being done, has permitted an opening to be left in the wall, I know of no law which says that the landlord may not go through that hole to distrain. The landlord can enter through such a hole because he does not thereby break in. That law has been applied to the case of houses, and also to the case of other buildings, such as a warehouse, in which a landlord wishes to distrain. The landlord must not break open an outer door to enter, and that is the law with regard to a stable or barn, as well as a house. It has been held that the landlord may go in if the door is open, but that he may not break in. If a building is within a yard, which people call the curtilage, it has been held that a landlord cannot enter such a building if it is closed. It, therefore, makes no difference whether a building is within the curtilage or not. E F G

With regard to a house, is a yard, which is within the curtilage, a part of the house? Can you persuade any ordinary person to believe that a yard is part of his house. I think not. It is true that by a conveyance of a house the yard will pass, but that is quite another matter. When, therefore, a landlord is within the curtilage he is not in the house, and if the house is locked up he cannot enter it by breaking in. It was so held in Eldridge v. Stacey (1). Although the landlord may have got within the curtilage, yet he is not in the house and cannot break the house. That shows that, so far as regards the law of distress, the curtilage is no part of the house. The argument, therefore, in this case that the landlord could not enter the house through an open window because he had climbed over a wall into the curtilage cannot succeed. The question is whether the landlord had not a right to enter the house. The house was open and he could enter and had a right to do so. H I

There is another defect in the case for the plaintiff. Even assuming that the curtilage is a part of the house, the landlord did not break into the curtilage. He broke nothing; he only got over a wall. What difference is there between getting over a wall like this and getting up a wall to go in at an open window? The landlord may get over a wall to get in at an open window because he does not thereby

A break anything. There can be no difference between the one case and the other. The law is quite clear upon this matter. Eldridge v. Stacey (1) decided this question quite correctly.

The judgment in American Concentrated Must Corp'n. v. Hendry (3) in the court below has nothing whatever to do with this case. When that case came before the Court of Appeal, the question decided was what was the outer door of a house, and it was held that the door of an outer yard was not the door of a house. That is in point in this case. I think that the decision of the court below was quite right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A landlord may distrain for rent, and may, in so doing, commit what would be a trespass if done by another person, provided that he does not break the outer door of any building. The landlord may enter through the open door of any building, and, having so entered, may break open inner doors; he may walk over a garden or park for the purpose of entering the building. The landlord must not, however, break into a building. The word "building" includes a house, a stable, or a barn.

D The question in this case is whether the landlord was justified in climbing over a wall which enclosed the yard of the house and thus getting to the house and then entering through an open window for the purpose of distraining. It seems to me clear that the landlord was entitled to do so. The yard is not part of the house. I think that it cannot be said to be so any more than a garden or park is part of a house.

E It is to be observed also that the landlord broke nothing in this case. I am clearly of opinion that there was nothing wrong in what the landlord did. This very point was clearly raised in Eldridge v. Stacey (1). The headnote to that case is as follows (15 C.B.N.S. at p. 458):

"There is no illegality in distraining for rent by climbing over a fence and so gaining access to the house by an open door."

F That statement is borne out by the report of the case, and is directly in point here. In his judgment, ERLE, C.J., says (ibid. at p. 459):

"I do not think the distress was rendered unlawful by the broker getting over the fence. None of the authorities cited warrant such a conclusion."

I think that there cannot be any distinction between a wall and a fence.

G Then there is a case, decided in 1867, four years after Eldridge v. Stacey (1), which is relied on by the plaintiff. That is Scott v. Buckley (2) the headnote to the report of which is as follows (16 L.T. at p. 573):

"A landlord in making a distress got over a fence or wall of from five to eight feet high at the back of the tenant's house, such being the only means of effecting an entrance, as the front door was locked: Held, that such a mode of entry was illegal."

H That seems to be in favour of the plaintiff. I cannot, however, believe that that case is correctly reported, and I think that there must have been some ground of distinction between that case and Eldridge v. Stacey (1) which does not appear in the report. I cannot think that BYLES, J., would not have considered Eldridge v. Stacey (1), though that case does not appear from the report to have been cited.

I The last case upon this subject is American Concentrated Must Corp'n. v. Hendry (3) which, in my opinion, confirms the decision in Eldridge v. Stacey (1); in that case the Court of Appeal determined what was meant by an outer door. That case, however, was not in its facts like this case. I think that this appeal must fail and be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I agree with the argument of the plaintiff that the curtilage is part of the house for some purposes. A conveyance of a house includes the curtilage also, and that has always been the law. If there had been a door in this wall leading into the curtilage, and the landlord had broken that door, I should think that he had exceeded his rights, and was a trespasser ab initio. It is not, however, necessary to decide that point in this case. There was no door in this wall. The landlord obtained access to the yard adjoining the house, and then got over the wall separating that yard from the yard of the tenant's house; he did not, however, break anything, and entered the house through an open window. I agree that, if done by anyone else, the getting over the wall would have been a trespass. The question now is, whether that was a trespass on the part of the landlord who levied the distress. The land belonged to the landlord, but, having let it, he had no right to enter except for the purpose of levying a distress. The law has always made that exception in his favour, that he may enter when rent is in arrear for the purpose of distraining. In this case, if there had been no wall but only a garden, anyone else who had entered it to get to the house would have been a trespasser, but the landlord is not a trespasser in such case. That is the distinction which the law has made in favour of the landlord.

The question, therefore, is whether getting over a wall to get into the yard makes the landlord a trespasser. If it does, I agree that the landlord was a trespasser ab initio. Has any case decided that the landlord is a trespasser under such circumstances? In 1863 Eldridge v. Stacey (1) was decided. The facts of that case were as follows. The plaintiff was tenant under the defendant of a house; the rent being in arrear a broker was employed to distrain; the broker, in the absence of the tenant, got over the fence from the adjoining garden and entered the house by a door which was only latched. Substituting the word "wall" for the word "fence," the facts of that case are absolutely identical with the facts of this case. There is really no distinction between that case and the present case. In his judgment in that case, ERLE, C.J., states the law thus (15 C.B.N.S. at p. 459):

"I do not think the distress was rendered unlawful by the broker getting over the fence."

The other learned judges all concurred. Three years later Scott v. Buckley (2) was decided at Nisi Prius, and there is a brief report of the case in the LAW TIMES REPORTS. Reading the report of that case it seems to be the exact contrary to Eldridge v. Stacey (1), and it was decided by BYLES, J., who was one of the judges who decided Eldridge v. Stacey (1). According to the report, the latter case was not cited in Scott v. Buckley (2), but I think that BYLES, J., must have remembered that decision. I think, therefore, that there must have been some distinction between the two cases which does not appear in the report.

Which of these decisions is most consistent with the general law upon this subject? The only restriction which the law imposes upon the right of the landlord to enter to distrain is, that he must not break into the house or building, and it has been decided that lifting up a window which is partly open is not breaking in. Short of breaking in, the landlord may get into the house or building in any way he can. Here the landlord only got over a wall, and that, in my opinion, is no more than walking over a garden, which is not a trespass when done by a landlord for the purpose of entering to distrain. I think that Eldridge v. Stacey (1) is an authority in this case, and I prefer that case to Scott v. Buckley (2). The plaintiff has no cause of action, and the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

The authority of a solicitor who has been retained for the purpose of obtaining an affiliation order does not continue after the order has been obtained, and the service upon him of a notice of appeal against the order is not a valid service upon the respondent, though the solicitor has accepted the service and his authority has not been expressly revoked.

Notes. In place of the original s. 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, a new s. 31 was substituted by the Summary Jurisdiction Appeals Act, 1933, s. 1. Appeal by the putative father of an illegitimate child from an order of the Divisional Court (MATHEW and WRIGHT, JJ.), discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus to the court of quarter sessions for the county of Oxford to hear and determine an appeal against an affiliation order, which had been granted to the mother, the respondent to the present appeal.

At the hearing of the application by the mother at petty sessions a solicitor appeared for each party, and an affiliation order was made by the justices against the putative father, by which he was ordered to pay three shillings a week towards the support of the child. The putative father thereupon instructed the solicitor who had appeared for him at the petty sessions to appeal against the order. On the last day for giving notice of appeal, the putative father's solicitor called at the office of the solicitor who had appeared for the mother, and handed to that solicitor a notice of appeal against the affiliation order, which the solicitor accepted on behalf of the mother. The solicitor then wrote a letter to the mother, which reached her on the following day, informing her of the receipt of the notice, and stating that, if she wished counsel to be instructed to support the order at quarter sessions, she must come to see him on the following Monday. On that day she called upon the solicitor and was told what the probable expense would be. She said that she had a friend who, she thought, would find the money, and that she would call again that day to tell him. She did not call again, but wrote on the next day that she was waiting to see what she could do, and would call again. She afterwards wrote him that she would not require his services. In the meantime she had retained another solicitor to act for her at the quarter sessions. When the appeal came on for hearing at the quarter sessions, it was objected on behalf of the mother that no valid notice of appeal had been given to her. The justices upheld the objection, and refused to hear the appeal.

The putative father obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to the justices to hear and determine the appeal. Upon the argument of the rule nisi the Divisional Court (MATHEW and WRIGHT, JJ.) discharged the rule. The putative father appealed.

By the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 :

"Section 31. Where any person is authorised . . . to appeal from the conviction or order of a court of summary jurisdiction to a court of general or quarter sessions, he may appeal to such court, subject to the conditions and regulations following: . . .

(2) The appellant shall, within the prescribed time, or if no time is prescribed within seven days after the day on which the said decision of the court was given, give notice of appeal by serving on the other party and on the clerk of the said court of summary jurisdiction notice in writing of his intention to appeal, and of the general grounds of such appeal."

Mackarness for the appellant.

F. Fitzgerald for the respondent.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The question upon this appeal is whether any notice of appeal was properly served upon the respondent.

The mother obtained an affiliation order against the putative father. For the purpose of obtaining that order she had retained a solicitor. When that order was obtained it seems to me that the purpose for which the solicitor had been retained was accomplished. The putative father decided to appeal against the order, and instructed a solicitor to act for him in respect of such an appeal. The first thing which it was necessary to do was to serve a notice of appeal upon the mother. It was argued that, inasmuch as personal service on the mother was not necessary, there might be service on some person who stood in such a relation to her that service upon him would be the same as service upon her. I do not think that it is necessary to consider that question. The notice of appeal was served upon the solicitor who had acted for the mother at the petty sessions, and it is contended that he then still continued to be her solicitor.

Upon what grounds can it be said that he continued to be her solicitor? There is no statutory enactment which makes him so continue. Is there any rule of the common law by which he continued to be her solicitor? With regard to common law actions it has, indeed, been held that, where there is a judgment which has not been carried into effect by execution, so long as any steps remain to be taken in the litigation for the purpose of obtaining the fruits of it for the successful

A party, or defending the other party from any wrong proceedings in execution, the action is not at an end, and the solicitor instructed by a party in the action continues to be his solicitor unless his authority has been revoked, and notice of such revocation given to the other party. Lady De la Pole v. Dick (1) shows that the same principle applies to litigation in the Court of Chancery, and that, where there was a decree or order made in a Chancery suit which it was necessary to work out in chambers, the authority of a solicitor continued until the decree or order was worked out. I think that the Court of Appeal did not intend to lay down any new rule in that case, but only held that the same rule obtained in courts of equity as in courts of law upon this matter. In my opinion, the court expressly declined to hold that the authority of a solicitor continued, or that the other party would be entitled to consider that it did continue, as long as it was possible that there might be an appeal. In that case it was pointed out by CORRON, L.J., that it was very inconvenient that the authority of a solicitor did not continue so long as there was a right of appeal, and BOWEN, L.J., expressed surprise that the matter had not been dealt with by the rules and orders. R.S.C., Ord. 7, r. 3, seems to have been framed in consequence of those expressions of opinion. That rule only applies to litigation in the High Court, and not to a case of this kind.

D In the present case a solicitor was employed to obtain an affiliation order, and that litigation was finished as soon as the order was obtained, nothing more remaining to be done. In my opinion, it is impossible to apply to such a case the rule applicable to common law actions where the fruits of the judgment have not been obtained by execution. If that rule were applied, the authority of the solicitor would, in a case of this kind, continue throughout the whole period during which E payments would have to be made under the affiliation order. I, therefore, think that the authority of the solicitor did not continue, and that the putative father was not entitled to consider that it did continue, at the time when the notice of appeal was served.

F It has been argued that the mother ratified the service of the notice upon the solicitor. I think that it is impossible to say that any such ratification took place under the circumstances. It was never pointed out to her that she had to consider whether she would or would not ratify the service of the notice upon the solicitor. She only considered whether she would retain him as her solicitor for the purposes of the appeal, and she decided not to so retain him. I think, therefore, that there was no valid service upon her of the notice of appeal, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

G BOWEN, L.J.—I concur.

KAY, L.J.—I agree.

Interlocutory Motion by the plaintiff for an interim injunction to restrain the defendant from selling or otherwise dealing with certain shares, and Cross-Motion by the defendant for an order directing a sale of the shares.

By an agreement, dated Nov. 19, 1891, and made between the plaintiff, of the one part, and the defendant, of the other part, the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant to purchase 130 six per cent. preference shares of £10 each, fully paid up, in Carmarthen United Breweries, Ltd., at the price of £1,300, the defendant paying the plaintiff £300 by way of deposit, and giving the plaintiff a four months' bill for £500 in further part payment of the purchase money, the balance of £500 to be paid on the date of the maturity of the said bill, whereupon the plaintiff would execute a transfer of the shares to the defendant. On the completion of the purchase the plaintiff was to pay or allow to the defendant the sum of £90 by way of commission on the sale and purchase and in reduction of the balance of £500. Until the completion of the purchase the certificate of the shares was to remain in the custody of a Mr. Rees as trustee for the parties, the interest on the shares being received by the plaintiff, and until payment of the whole of the purchase money, the certificate, shares, and interest were to stand charged with the payment to the plaintiff of the unpaid purchase money. In default of completion the plaintiff was to be at liberty to sell the shares, and out of the proceeds to retain the unpaid balance of purchase money, and pay the balance to the defendant.

The defendant paid the plaintiff the deposit of £300, and gave him a four months' promissory note for £500, but the promissory note was dishonoured at maturity, whereupon the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant in the Queen's Bench Division for the amount of the promissory note and interest. The defendant delivered a statement of defence to that action, the question being whether the transaction between him and the plaintiff was, as alleged by the latter, one of sale and purchase of the shares, or whether the defendant was merely the agent of the plaintiff to sell the shares on commission. Shortly after the close of the pleadings in that action the plaintiff discovered that the defendant was advertising an intended sale of the shares by auction, whereupon he (the plaintiff) issued a writ in the Chancery Division, before KEKEWICH, J., claiming a declaration that he was entitled to a lien on the shares for £1,000, the balance of purchase money

A remaining unpaid, with interest; also to have the shares sold towards payment of the £1,000 and interest; judgment for the balance (if any) remaining unsatisfied after such sale; and an injunction. The plaintiff then served the defendant with notice of motion in the Chancery action for an interim injunction to restrain the defendant from selling or otherwise dealing with the shares, on the ground that the offering of the shares for sale by auction would depreciate their value, and prejudice his, the plaintiff's, lien; and the defendant then served the plaintiff with a cross notice of motion in the transaction for an order directing a sale by auction of the shares and payment of the proceeds into court to the credit of the action, to be dealt with as the court should direct, on the ground that the shares had gone up in value, and would, if sold, realise more than sufficient to meet any claim the plaintiff might have under the agreement, and to put an end to the action in the Queen's Bench Division. Subsequently, an order was made transferring that action from the Queen's Bench Division to KEKEWICH, J. The two motions in the Chancery Division now came on for hearing.

D. Villiers Meager for the defendant's motion.

D KEKEWICH, J.—On this agreement of Nov. 19, 1891, it is a question whether the transaction was one of sale and purchase of the shares out and out, or whether, in fact, the sale and agreement was only a sham, and really the defendant was constituted an agent of the plaintiff to sell the shares on commission, and the plaintiff could withdraw his mandate at any time. The defendant says that he is merely agent of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff insists that the transaction was a sale and purchase of the shares. That question is one to be decided at the trial of the action. In the meantime the plaintiff is entitled to protection. The defendant also is entitled to protection; he has been made to pay £300 deposit, and is entitled to a lien to that amount at all events.

E The question is, Has the court power to realise the security? It has no original jurisdiction. R.S.C., Ord. 50, r. 2, provides that it shall be lawful for the court or a judge, on the application of any party, to make any order for the sale, by any person or persons named in such order, and in such manner, and on such terms as the court or judge may think desirable, of any goods, wares, or merchandise which may be of a perishable nature or likely to injure from keeping, or which for any other just and sufficient reason it may be desirable to have sold at once. The object of the rule is to enable the court from time to time to order a sale of goods, etc., which are in dispute, and so to preserve the proceeds.

F Are shares "goods" so as to come within the terms of the order? In Bartholomew v. Freeman (1) a horse was held to be included in the word "goods"; and in R. v. Slade (2), under s. 40 of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, a dog was also held to be "goods." It seems to me that, though shares are uncommonly unlike a dog, the reasons given by MANISTY, J., and HAWKINS, J., in that case are applicable here. MANISTY, J., seems to have based his decision upon an illustration suggested by HAWKINS, J., in the course of the argument, namely, the case of a will containing the words "I give and bequeath all my worldly goods," and the illustration recalls words with which most of us are familiar at some period of our life, namely, "with all my worldly goods I thee endow." Upon these authorities, then, I hold that shares are "goods" within the order. In Coddington v. Jacksonville, Pensacola and Mobile Rail. Co. (3) the Court of Appeal ordered a sale of bonds of the State of Florida, but not under Ord. 50, r. 2. But now, supposing the word "goods" includes shares, can I order them to be sold in this particular case? Are shares "perishable or likely to injure from keeping"? I think not, but I do think they come under the last words of the rule "which for any other just and sufficient reason it may be desirable to have sold at once." In Bartholomew v. Freeman (1) the court thought it was a sufficient reason to order the sale of a horse because it was eating its head off. But as to shares, it is common knowledge that shares are of a fluctuating character, so that any wise man, wishing to realise his security, would as soon as he could obtain a convenient market.

It seems to me that the defendant gives a very sufficient reason for selling the shares at once, and I think I should order a sale. The order will be that the shares be sold under the direction of the judge in chambers, and the proceeds of sale paid into court. Costs of both motions costs in the action.

Bill of Sale—Security—Maintenance—Power to sell goods—Sale by private treaty or public auction on or off the premises—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict., c. 43) Schedule.

A bill of sale contained a clause giving the grantee "power to sell the goods by private treaty or public auction on or off the premises."

Held: this clause was necessary "for the maintenance of the security" within the meaning of the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, and, therefore, did not vitiate the bill of sale.

Re Barber, Ex parte Stanford (1886), 17 Q.B.D. 259; 34 W.R. 237, C.A.; 7 Digest (Repl.) 72, 413.

Appeal on an interpleader issue by the claimant, Mrs. Wall, from a decision of Croydon County Court, holding that a bill of sale held by her, which had been given by her husband, the defendant, over his furniture, was void for not being in the prescribed form, and that the plaintiff, a judgment creditor of the husband, was entitled to seize the furniture.

In December, 1887, the defendant Wall gave a bill of sale on certain furniture to the Mutual Loan Association. In December, 1889, the Loan Association were pressing the defendant for the balance of £42 due on the bill of sale. The defendant was unable to pay this sum, and on Dec. 10, 1889, his wife, the claimant, paid the money to the Loan Association. On Jan. 23, 1890, she took an assignment of the bill of sale from the Loan Association, so that henceforth she became the holder

A of that bill over her husband's furniture. The money with which the claimant paid off the bill of sale was her own. The plaintiff, having recovered judgment against the defendant, proceeded to seize the furniture comprised in the bill of sale. The claimant then set up the bill of sale over the furniture, which had been assigned to her. The present interpleader issue was directed, and the question of the validity of the bill of sale was raised. The bill contained a clause giving to B the grantee "power to sell these goods by private treaty or public auction on or off the premises."

The county court judge held that the bill of sale was bad, and gave judgment for the execution creditor as regards the goods comprised in the bill of sale. The C claimant appealed.

Colam for the claimant.

Carrington for the plaintiff.

A. L. SMITH, J.—This is an appeal from the learned county court judge at D Croydon, who held this bill of sale bad on the ground that it gave power to the grantee to enter and seize the goods and sell the same when seized on the premises, and he held that that clause vitiated the bill of sale on the ground that it was not in the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882.

The form is more or less a hard-and-fast one. In this form, however, there is some latitude given, namely, that the parties may insert in their own terms E matters which are necessary for the maintenance of the security, that is, matters which the court may hold to be necessary for the maintenance of the security; and I should say that the clause in the present case is one necessary for the maintenance of the security. To go by steps, a clause giving power to seize and sell on the premises by private sale, in my judgment, is a clause necessary for the maintenance of the security. There is direct authority by DAY, J., in Lyon v. Morris (1) that that F power to seize and sell on the premises by private sale is a reasonable provision and one necessary for the maintenance of the security. Does the clause become unreasonable if sale by public auction is also included? I do not think so, and I do not see how that can alter the case. I am prepared to hold that the bill of sale is not vitiated by the remaining part of the clause in question.

The learned judge seems to have been led astray by Bardell v. Daykin (2). The G point there argued was argued before MATHEW and CAVE, JJ. almost at the same time as Furber v. Cobb (3), in the Court of Appeal, and the court arrived at the same conclusion. In that case objection was taken to the bill of sale on the ground that it contained a clause that the grantee might

"at any time during the subsistence of the security affix such bills and placards having reference to the said chattels and things as he or they might think fit H on any premises for the time being in the occupation of the grantor;"

and the court there held that that clause was not necessary to the maintenance of the security, and that it vitiated the bill of sale. That is a very different case from the present. It seems to me, that this bill of sale does not sin against the form in the schedule, and we think, therefore, that the judgment of the learned I judge was erroneous, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Upon the winding-up of a company the undertaking, on a floating charge on which debenture holders had lent their money, came to an end, and, therefore, the debenture holders became entitled to realise their security for the full amount secured by their debentures, notwithstanding that the day mentioned therein for payment of the capital has not arrived.

Appeal by the plaintiff, a debenture holder, from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., reported [1894] 2 Ch. 547, refusing to grant a declaration that the principal moneys secured by the debentures issued by the defendant company had become due and owing upon the winding-up of the defendant company.

The action was brought by the holder of debentures charged on the undertaking and property of the company, which was being wound-up, for the realisation of the security, and the question raised by this appeal was, whether the principal moneys secured by the debentures and thereby made payable at a future date, could be treated as if they had become due at the date of the commencement of the winding-up. The company was registered under the Companies Acts in September, 1887. Its object was to acquire and work certain patents. It had power to borrow money on debentures, and it raised £6,000 at 6 per cent. on sixty debentures for £100 each charged on the undertaking and property of the company. The interest was to be paid half-yearly, and the principal was repayable on Dec. 31, 1894. On July 19, 1890, the company was ordered to be wound-up by the court. On July 2, 1890, a writ was issued by the plaintiff, on behalf of himself and all the other holders of the debentures, for an account and a receiver. On Feb. 5, 1894, a statement of claim was filed, and on Mar. 14, 1894, KEKEWICH, J., on a motion for judgment in default of defence, gave judgment for the plaintiff, directing an account of what was due to the plaintiff and the other holders of the outstanding

A debentures, and an inquiry into the question what the property comprised in and charged by the debentures consisted, but he held that the principal moneys secured by the debentures ought not to be treated as if they had become due at the date of the winding-up. The plaintiff appealed.

May 28, 1894. The following judgments were read.

. LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The plaintiff is not content with the order of KEKEWICH, J., as no account is directed of what is due in respect
C of the principal sums secured, and he has appealed in order to have the judgment corrected in this respect. The time for the payment of the principal not having yet arrived, it is clear that it is not a debt for which any action at law could now be brought. But it is equally clear that, as the company is being wound-up, the plaintiff and the other debenture holders could, if they chose, prove against the company in respect of all the moneys secured by the debentures, whether due or D not: see Companies Act, 1862, s. 158. Moreover, by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10, if the debenture holders did so prove, they would have to give up their securities, and they could only prove for such amount as would be provable if the company had been a debtor and had been adjudicated bankrupt. The amount provable in bankruptcy in respect of a future debt bearing interest was determined in Re Browne and Wingrove, Ex parte Ador (2).

E The plaintiff, however, is not seeking to prove his debt, nor is he bound to do so. On the other hand, he is not content simply to rest on his security, nor is he content to have his interest kept down. He wants to realise his security and to apply the proceeds in paying off the principal and interest, although the time fixed for paying off the principal has not yet arrived. The undertaking, on the security of which the money was borrowed, has in fact come to an end by the winding-up, and this circumstance entitles the debenture holders to realise their security at F once. This point was determined in Hodson v. Tea Co. (1), which was itself based on the earlier case of Re Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Co. (3). In Hodson v. Tea Co. (1) the debenture was not due, but it was treated as having become due on the commencement of the winding-up of the company, and accounts were directed of what was due for principal and interest on that footing. The G principle on which this decision is founded is, in my opinion, correct, and the plaintiff is entitled to an order to give effect to it. The order appealed from must be varied accordingly, and the costs must be added to the amount due to the plaintiff on his security.

LOPES, L.J., concurred.

H KAY, L.J.—This action is brought by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other holders of debentures in the defendant company for foreclosure or sale. By the form of the debentures the principal money secured by them was charged upon all the undertaking and property of the company, both present and future, as “a floating security,” and was accordingly

I “not to prevent or hinder the company from leasing, exchanging, selling, mortgaging, or otherwise dealing with the property as it may from time to time think fit.”

The principal money so charged was not to become payable till Dec. 31, 1894, but the company was empowered to pay off the debenture holders on July 1 or Dec. 1 in any year, on giving at least three calendar months' previous notice in writing. The interest at 6 per cent. was payable on stated days fixed by coupons attached to the debentures. Default was made in payment of the interest on July 1, 1890.

The action was commenced on July 2, 1890. On July 4, 1890, an order was made for a receiver. On July 19, 1890, an order was made to wind-up the company. On Mar. 14, 1894, this action was heard as a short cause. The appeal is from this judgment. A

The question is whether the debenture holders can claim as against the security the interest and the full amount of their principal, although the day fixed for payment has not arrived, or whether they must be satisfied with interest only till the day of payment, or with the principal subject to a discount for payment before the day on which the principal becomes due. It is material to observe that it is not a question of proof in the winding-up, but of realisation of the security. By the winding-up order the position of the debenture holders is very much altered. The subject of their security is, amongst other things, the undertaking—that is, the profit-producing concern. The winding-up practically put an end to any chance of producing further profits. The security is a floating charge—that is, the company might use all its assets included in the security for the purpose of its bona fide business, as though the charges did not exist. These powers are to some extent vested in the liquidator for the purposes of winding-up the company. If the debenture holders were compelled to wait until the debentures became due, the security might, and probably would, be very much depreciated in the meantime. These considerations led to the conclusions expressed by GIFFARD, L.J., in Re Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Co. (3) that, upon the occurrence of the winding-up, the debenture holders had a right at once to realise their security. It follows that, if the time of realising is accelerated by this event, the realisation must be for the full amount, as though the debt was then due, and this seems to have been held in the same case. The same result was arrived at by HALL, V.-C., in Hodson v. Tea Co. (1). B

I think there should be a declaration that, upon the occurrence of the winding-up, the debenture holders became entitled to realise their security for the full amount secured by their respective debentures, notwithstanding that the day mentioned therein for payment of the capital had not arrived, and that an account should be directed of what is due for principal and interest to the time of actual payment on that footing, and for the costs of this action. The other inquiries directed seem to be in the right form. The costs of the appeal should be added to the security. F

JOHNSON v. DIPROSE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.), February 9, 1893]

Bill of Sale—Passing to grantee of property in goods—Right to possession—Seizure of goods by grantee—Remedies of grantor—Right to sue for trespass—Damage by grantee to goods during lawful seizure—Negligence—Right of grantor to recover.

When a bill of sale is executed in accordance with the form prescribed by the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, the property in the goods thereby assigned passes to the grantee, and upon the happening of any one of the five causes mentioned in s. 7 of that Act, the right to possession also passes to him. If the grantor pays the money due or makes a valid tender at the right time, the grantee may not seize the goods; if he does so he will be liable for trespass. If, however, the grantor does not pay the money due or make a valid tender at the right time, the goods may be seized. Upon a lawful seizure, the only rights of the grantor are the summary remedy exercisable within five days given by s. 7, and the equitable right to bring an action for redemption (which, unless there is fraud or oppression on the part of the grantee, is only given upon the grantor paying principal and interest and the costs charged and expenses and the costs of the suit). If the goods are seized for any of the causes in the section, the grantor cannot sue the grantee in trespass for removing them, even after tender of principal interest and costs. If goods are lawfully seized and are damaged in the course of removal through the grantee's negligence, the grantor cannot sue for this injury in an action for trespass, but, on redeeming, the grantor is entitled to be credited with the loss.

damages for trespass to goods seized by the defendant, including damages for damage caused to the goods by the negligence of the defendant's servants while removing them. A

The plaintiff gave to the defendant a bill of sale upon some household furniture by way of security for the payment of money. The bill was drawn up in accordance with the form prescribed in such cases by the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and provided for the repayment of the money thereby secured by certain monthly instalments payable upon certain dates specified in the bill. The plaintiff made default in payment of one of these instalments. The defendant thereupon seized the goods, and put a man in possession. Some time after the expiration of five days from the seizure the defendant began to remove the goods. The plaintiff then tendered to the defendant the sum of £51 5s., the amount remaining due in respect of the sum advanced and interest up to that date, and also the sum of £2 15s. for the expenses of the seizure, demanding at the same time two separate receipts for the two sums. The defendant refused to give these two receipts, and as the plaintiff's tender was conditional on the two receipts being given, he removed the goods. B C

The plaintiff then brought this action for damages for trespass to the goods, and for redemption on payment of what was due. The defendant paid £5 into court in respect of some injury done to the goods while they were being removed. At the trial of the action before WRIGHT, J., with a jury, the learned judge held that the tender was a valid one, and upon the jury finding a verdict of £50 damages for the trespass, and £5 for the injury done to the goods during removal beyond the £5 paid into court by the defendant, he gave judgment for the plaintiff for that amount. He also gave judgment for the plaintiff for redemption of the goods as asked for, and gave the plaintiff the costs of the action. The defendant appealed. D E

"Provided always, that the chattels hereby assigned shall not be liable to seizure, or to be taken possession of by the said C. D. [the grantee] for any cause other than those specified in s. 7 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882." F

By s. 7 of the Act it is provided:

"Personal chattels assigned under a bill of sale shall not be liable to be seized or taken possession of by the grantee for any other than the following causes: (1) If the grantor shall make default in payment of the sum or sums of money thereby secured at the time therein provided for payment, . . . Provided that the grantor may within five days from the seizure or taking possession of any chattels on account of any of the above-mentioned causes, apply to the High Court or to a judge thereof in chambers, and such court or judge, if satisfied that by payment of money or otherwise the said cause of seizure no longer exists, may restrain the grantee from removing or selling the said chattels, or may make such other order as may seem just." G H

Jelf, Q.C., and Cababé for the defendant.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Pocock for the plaintiff.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff has brought an action against the defendant for an alleged wrongful interference with the plaintiff's goods. I

The action is in two forms, one being a common law action for trespass, the other an equitable action for redemption. The learned judge who tried the case with a jury gave judgment for the plaintiff in respect of the common law action of trespass for the damages which had been assessed by the jury partly in respect to the actual injury done to the plaintiff's goods, and partly in respect of the injury suffered by the plaintiff in consequence of the wrongful seizure. The learned judge also gave judgment for the plaintiff upon his claim for redemption. The defendant has now appealed to this court on the ground that no action of trespass would lie

A at common law. He says that the plaintiff had given him a bill of sale according to the form prescribed by the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, which had been registered, and that the plaintiff had made default in certain things whereby the defendant became entitled under the provisions of the bill of sale to seize and keep the goods. Therefore, says the defendant, no action of trespass will lie at common law. That gives rise to a question as to what is the right view to be taken, and what is the construction of a bill of sale drawn up according to the statutory form. I apprehend that such a bill of sale might have been given before the passing of the Act which provides that every bill of sale given by way of security for the payment of money shall be void unless made in accordance with the form in the schedule.

C What is the meaning of a bill of sale under this Act? It is a document given in respect of the chattels therein mentioned by which the property in the chattels passes to the grantee, but not the possession. A bill of sale is not a pledge, because in the case of a pledge possession does pass. A bill under this Act is to be in a certain form, and it must include the stipulations contained in s. 7 of the Act. The form is to the effect that the indenture witnesseth that, in consideration of the sum of £      , "A. B. doth hereby assign unto C. D." the chattels described in the schedule. By those words the property in the chattels passes.

D But then comes the proviso at the end of the bill which also speaks of "the chattels hereby assigned." That proviso incorporating s. 7 of the Act derogates from the full and absolute right of the grantee, not as to his property in the goods, but as to his right to take possession of them. He can only take possession for any one of the five causes specified in s. 7. If any of the events there named takes place, then the grantee has, besides his right of property, a right given him to take possession of the goods. Then when the grantee has seized and taken possession, if the grantor within five days makes good all that he ought, he may apply to the High Court for the remedy provided by the section; that summary remedy being given instead of the old remedy which the Court of Chancery would formerly have applied. If the grantor does not apply to the High Court within the five days he loses his summary remedy, but he still remains entitled to use the old equitable remedy of a redemption suit. Therefore, if the grantor pays his money at the right time, the grantee cannot, after payment, seize the goods; if he should seize he will be liable to an action of trespass.

Again, if at the right time the grantor, in fulfilment of the stipulations in the bill, tenders to the grantee all that he is bound to pay, such a tender will, for the purpose of fixing the rights in this matter, be the same as payment; so that, if the grantee rejects such a tender and seizes the goods, he will be liable to an action of trespass. But if the grantor does not pay at the right time or make a proper tender, then the provisions of s. 7 apply, and the grantee is entitled to seize the goods. The grantor cannot then bring an action of trespass for such seizure, because the seizure is a rightful seizure by the defendant of his own goods. An action for trespass lies at common law for a wrongful interference with the plaintiff's actual possession of goods, or his legal right to the immediate possession of them. Under this bill of sale the plaintiff had neither. It is admitted that he did not pay the money due to the grantee, or tender it at the right time, and the grantee was therefore entitled to take possession of the goods. The plaintiff, therefore, was not entitled to bring this action for trespass, and the judgment for damages for trespass being wrong, the appeal upon this point is successful.

I On the question of the equitable right to redeem, there is another point to be considered. The plaintiff could maintain a suit for redemption upon the terms of paying the principal and interest and the costs, charges, and expenses, and the costs of the suit, because a plaintiff can only succeed in such a suit upon those terms, unless there has been some extortion or oppression on the part of the defendant. The learned judge has decreed redemption, and rightly I think, except upon one point. The claim for damages for injury to the goods was maintainable in the redemption suit, though not in the action for trespass, and as I think the jury meant that the damage to the goods was caused by the negligence of the defendant, we will allow the amount assessed by them to be part of the order for the redemption of the goods. Then the learned judge has not given the defendant the costs of the claim for redemption, and that must be put right. The appeal substantially succeeds, and the plaintiff must therefore pay the costs. A

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point to be considered is, whether there is any foundation for an action of trespass, or any other common law action. An action for trespass to goods will not lie unless the plaintiff at the time of the alleged trespass was either in possession of the goods, or entitled to their immediate possession; and, for the reasons already given by the Master of the Rolls, I think that in this case there was no ground for an action of trespass, nor was any other common law right of the plaintiff infringed by the seizure and removal of the goods by the defendant. B C

It seems to me that the matter becomes clear when you consider what a mortgage of chattels is, and what is the effect of the particular form of mortgage prescribed by the Bills of Sale Act. The use of the term bill of sale is not confined to mortgages of chattels. Where chattels are mortgaged, the property in them passes to the mortgagee as a general rule, though of course the parties to the agreement can make any stipulations they may like as to the passing of the property. Since by a mortgage of chattels the property in them generally passes, the mortgagor provides that he shall remain in possession of the goods until the arrival of the time for payment of money due under the mortgage. Then, if at that time he makes default in the payment, his right of possession ceases, and as the property in the goods has already passed, he cannot bring an action for trespass to the goods. What other common law right of action could the plaintiff in this case have except under any special term in the deed? The property and possession of the goods had passed to the mortgagee. The mortgagor had an equitable right of redemption upon certain terms, but he had no legal right. Therefore, if there were no breach of any term in the deed, no common law action would lie. D E

The reasoning seems to me to be clear, and there is express authority on the point to be found in Maugham v. Sharpe (1). That was a case of a mortgage by deed of chattels which were assigned to secure repayment of an advance, with power to the mortgagees upon default in payment by the mortgagor to sell and dispose of the goods. ERLE, C.J., and WILLIAMS, J., point out distinctly that the mortgage was not a pledge. WILLIAMS, J., says (17 C.B.N.S. at p. 464): F

“It is said that there cannot be a mortgage of a chattel, and therefore that this instrument must operate as a pledge. But why so? There is nothing illegal in making a grant in this form. The books recognise the distinction between a mortgage and a pledge of personal chattels; and there is an express authority in the case of Flory v. Denny (2), that there may be a mortgage of chattels, as distinguished from a pledge, without delivery; so that there would seem to be nothing contrary to law in what is ordinarily called a mortgage of personal chattels. The property is absolutely and indefeasibly vested in the grantee if the condition be not performed; and a court of law can look at no other owner than the mortgagee or grantee.” G H

That is a clear authority that in the case of an ordinary mortgage of chattels given by way of security for the payment of money, when the conditions have not been performed, the property in the chattels vests absolutely and indefeasibly in the mortgagee. That disposes of the plaintiff's argument. I

Of course, the forms of mortgages may vary, and we have now to consider what is the true effect of the form prescribed by the Act of 1882. It begins by following the ordinary form of a mortgage, and, by assigning the chattels, passes the property in them to the grantee. Then the proviso at the end imports the provisions of s. 7 into the bill; and, in interpreting the deed, it must be read as if it had been a bill of sale executed before the Act, and containing conditions similar to those

- A set out in s. 7. The property in the goods being in the grantee, the grantor has the right of possession until one of the five causes mentioned in the section occurs. If the mortgagor seizes before that, he is liable to an action of trespass at common law, or to an action on the deed. Whichever way it is looked at, whether as an action of trespass or on the deed, or on the statute, if the grantee seized before the time came when the property was absolutely and indefeasibly vested in him,
- B the result would be the same. Here the plaintiff has failed to perform the conditions; he neither paid the money when due, nor made a valid tender, i.e., a tender unlogged with conditions. He therefore lost his right of possession, and as his right of property had already gone, there was nothing left to him on which he could bring any common law action. The tender, I should add, was made too late to be a valid one, and I think there is no pretence for saying that there was any
- C ground on which a common law action could be maintained. The plaintiff had, nevertheless, an equitable right, not a common law right, to redeem the goods upon terms. If it is by his own default that he is driven to use this remedy, he must pay the costs. The case would be otherwise if he had been driven to this remedy by any oppression on the part of the defendant. In this case there being no oppression the ordinary rule must prevail, and the plaintiff must pay the costs.
- D As to the injury done to the goods: damages for that would not be recoverable at common law, but in equity, where goods are wasted, an inquiry would be ordered, and the amount found due set off against the debt. It would be ridiculous to send this case down for an inquiry, and I think that we ought to allow to the plaintiff the £10 at which the jury assessed the damages.

- E A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action for trespass to goods, the subject of a bill of sale granted by the plaintiff to the defendant. If the defendant had seized the goods at the time when the instalments were not in arrear, the plaintiff would have had a good cause of action against him. But when the seizure took place the plaintiff was in arrear with the payment of the instalments, and under the terms of the bill of sale the defendant was entitled to enter and seize the goods. For that
- F act no cause of action for trespass or on the case accrued to the plaintiff. Ten days after the seizure the plaintiff tendered the money due, and afterwards the defendant took the goods away. But the defendant had a legal right to the goods five days after the seizure, and after that date what right had the plaintiff? It seems to me clear that the only right the plaintiff had five days after the seizure was an equitable right to bring a suit for the redemption of the goods. It has been argued that the
- G tender ten days after the seizure gave the plaintiff some other right. I think that is an entire misapprehension. I agree that the judgment of WRIGHT, J., that there was a common law cause of action must be set aside. The plaintiff was in the same position as an ordinary mortgagor when the mortgagee is in possession. The only right was a right to redeem on payment of the principal sum due, with interest and costs, charges, and expenses.

SYNGE v. SYNGE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.), November 30, 1893, January 17, 1894]

Contract—Consideration—Promise to bequeath property to wife for life in consideration of agreement to marry—Breach—Conveyance of property to other persons during wife's life—Right of wife to sue at once—Damages—Measure—Present value of life estate.

The defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff, whom he was then desirous of marrying, saying: "You thoroughly understand the terms . . . which are, that I leave house and land to you for your lifetime." The plaintiff shortly afterwards married the defendant upon the faith of the above letter. The defendant made a will, leaving the house and land to his wife for her life, but he subsequently destroyed that will, and conveyed the house and land to his daughters absolutely.

Held: there was a binding contract to leave the property to the plaintiff, which could be enforced; there was a breach of the contract, by the conveying away of the property, which entitled the plaintiff to sue at once for damages; and the measure of damages was the present value of the possible life estate to which the plaintiff would have been entitled if she had survived her husband.

B Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of MATHEW, J., upon further consideration in London, after the trial without a jury at Bristol.

On Dec. 24, 1883, the defendant, Sir R. Synge, wrote a letter to the plaintiff, a lady whom he was then desirous to marry, in which he said:

C "You, my love, thoroughly understand the terms (and I daresay have told Mr. Woodruff) on which we are to put a stop to all this bother by becoming 'one another,' which are, that I leave house and land to you for your lifetime; but you being otherwise provided for in the 'tin' line, I leave what I have to the girls."

D The house and land referred to were a house and land called Ardfield, in which the defendant, Sir R. Synge, then resided with two daughters by a former marriage. The lady had some property of her own, of which Mr. Woodruff was trustee. The marriage between the plaintiff and the defendant took place on Jan. 5, 1884, ten days after the date of the letter.

E At the trial the plaintiff said that she answered the letter, but there was no copy, and the original was not produced. When she received the letter she was staying with Mr. Woodruff, and she showed it to him. He advised her to keep the letter, and to have it stamped. She did keep the letter. The lady's property was settled upon herself, but there was no settlement of the defendant's property upon her.

F Shortly after the marriage the defendant made a will, by which he left Ardfield to the plaintiff for life. This will was subsequently destroyed, and the defendant made other wills. On Sept. 29, 1892, the defendant, Sir R. Synge, conveyed Ardfield to his two daughters, the other defendants, by deed, having, as he said, totally forgotten the letter of Dec. 24, 1883. The property was leasehold property.

The plaintiff brought this action against the defendant, Sir R. Synge, and his two daughters, asking for a declaration that she was entitled to a certain house and land called Ardfield, and in the alternative, for damages for breach of contract.

G At the trial before MATHEW, J., without a jury, the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the defendants, upon the ground that the letter had not been treated by the plaintiff as a contract at all, but as a mere statement of intention by which the defendant, the intended husband, was not to be bound. The plaintiff appealed.

H Jan. 17, 1894. KAY, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. The questions which arise in this case are these: (i) Was there a binding contract? (ii) Was it such a contract as could be enforced in equity, or was there a remedy in damages for the breach of it? (iii) Has the time arrived at which such remedy can be asserted? If the remedy be by way of damages, what amount of damages should be given? The action was tried by a judge without a jury, so that all questions both of fact and law are open on this appeal.

I It will be convenient to consider the questions in the order in which they are stated. The alleged contract is contained in a letter of Dec. 24, 1883, by Sir R. Synge, the defendant, to the plaintiff, a lady whom he was desirous to marry, and is in these words:

"You, my love, thoroughly understand the terms (and I daresay have told Mr. Woodruff) on which we are to put a stop to all this bother by becoming

'one another,' which are, that I leave house and land to you for your lifetime; but, you being otherwise provided for in the 'tin' line, I leave what I have to the girls. You know, my darling, most of my income dies with me. You would have enough (at least I suppose so) to keep the pot boiling, whilst they would have nothing. I hope, my darling, you see the thing as I mean it. You know, or ought to know, it is not your 'tin' (for I don't know or care what it is) but yourself, I want. True, it is possible, but highly improbable, that I might come in for the title and should be much better off. Should such a thing happen, we could see what I ought and would do for you."

It is not necessary to quote more of the letter.

There seems to be no doubt that the house and land referred to were the house and a small piece of land called Ardfield, in Devonshire, worth, it is said, about £60 or £70 a year, in which the defendant was then residing with two daughters by a former marriage. The defendant was not then Sir R. Synge. He succeeded to the title afterwards. The lady, who is the plaintiff, had some property of her own, of which Mr. Woodruff was trustee. He was not a solicitor. The construction of the letter is plain. It is a statement of the terms as to property on which the defendant proposed to marry the plaintiff. The marriage took place on Jan. 5, 1884, ten days after the date of the letter. But it is argued that the plaintiff did not understand it to be a binding promise, and did not so treat it. It appears from her cross-examination that she answered the letter; she added "but have no copy only from memory." That seems to intimate that she had some recollection of the terms of her answer. But she was not asked what those terms were by counsel on either side, nor was the letter produced. The plaintiff was staying with Mr. Woodruff when she received the letter from the defendant, and she showed it to Mr. Woodruff. She kept the letter, and says in her evidence that she thought it a binding agreement. Mr. Woodruff says that he advised her to have her own property formally settled upon her, and that upon seeing the letter he explained to her that it "was a fair promise of the house or the use of the house during her life," and, he continued :

"I considered it constituted a good contract, and I advised her that it ought to take the form of a deed, as, although he might make his will, he could revoke it, and her reply was, that he was such a good religious man he would never go back from his promise. Whenever I pressed my view, that was always her answer. She wished to rely upon his promise."

He further says that he advised her to keep the letter and to have it stamped. To this she made no special reply. This witness was not cross-examined.

A settlement of the plaintiff's property was made. It is dated Jan. 4, 1884, and was executed by both the plaintiff and the defendant. It gives no benefit whatever to the defendant, nor does it affect any of his property. Except the letter in question he made no settlement upon the plaintiff. The marriage having taken place on Jan. 5, 1884, about the end of February the plaintiff and defendant went to Arcachon, for the sake of one of his daughters, who was out of health. When there he made a will which has since been destroyed. By that will he certainly gave to the plaintiff an interest in Ardfield after his death, and he communicated the fact to her. It was suggested in cross-examining her that it was not for her life but during widowhood only, and she said in answer to a further question that it did not occur to her to tell him that this was not according to the letter. It is argued from this that she could not have considered the letter binding. But on the other hand, in his answer to interrogatories, and also in a letter dated Mar. 12, 1892, to her solicitor, the defendant says it was left to her for her life, and he does not mention the limitation of widowhood, and one of his daughters, Mrs. Gilbert, says he told her he had left Ardfield to his wife for life. An undated letter is produced, from one of his daughters to the defendant, suggesting that he should leave Ardfield to the plaintiff for her life, and this daughter in her evidence states

A that she made that suggestion knowing nothing of the letter of Dec. 24, 1883. The defendant says in his evidence that he had forgotten this letter, and intended to leave Ardfield to his daughters by the will of 1884, but they suggested he should leave it to his wife.

Unhappily dissension arose, and the defendant destroyed the will of 1884, and made other wills, and on Sept. 29, 1892, he, by deed, conveyed the property to
B his daughters, having, as he says, totally forgotten the letter of Dec. 24, 1883. The learned judge who decided this case has held that the letter was not treated by the plaintiff as a contract, although, by the advice of Mr. Woodruff, she preserved it, because she did not adopt his recommendation to have the terms carried out by deed, nor have the letter stamped. He considers the result of the evidence of what passed between her and Mr. Woodruff to be that the plaintiff

C "understood that there had been no contract upon the subject, and that she had only had an expression of the intention of her future husband. She declines to have any discussion upon the subject; she declines to have it stamped; and she says she is perfectly willing to rely upon the intention expressed in that letter, because she considered Sir Robert Synge, her intended D husband, a religious man and a man of honour, and would keep his word."

But what does that amount to? She had a written proposal of terms before the marriage from the defendant, her intended husband, as to the provision he would make for her. She declined to stipulate for a formal deed, which would be an alteration of the terms, because she believed he would keep his word, and leave it to her by his will; and in that belief she married him, and carefully preserved the
E letter. Although we have not her letter in answer, the inference that she accepted the terms, and married on the faith of this promise in writing, seems to us irresistible.

We cannot, with deference to the learned judge, agree in his view that she treated the letter as a mere statement of intention by which the defendant was not to be bound. The law relating to proposals of this kind before marriage was
F stated by LORD LYNDHURST, L.C., in Hammersley v. De Biel (1) (12 Cl. & Fin. at pp. 78, 79):

"The principle of law, or at least of equity, is this, that if a party holds out inducements to another to celebrate a marriage, and holds them out deliberately and plainly, and the other party consents and celebrates the marriage in consequence of them, if he had good reason to expect that it was intended that
G he should have the benefit of the proposal which was so held out, a court of equity will take care that he is not disappointed, and will give effect to the proposal."

We are of opinion that the proposal of terms in this case was made as an inducement to the plaintiff to marry; that she consented to the terms and married the
H defendant on the faith that he would keep his word; and that accordingly there was a binding contract on the defendant's part to leave to the plaintiff the house and land at Ardfield for her life.

Secondly, what is the remedy? Marriage is a valuable consideration for such a contract of the highest order, and when, as here, the contract is in writing, so that there is no question upon the Statute of Frauds, in the language already
I quoted:

"A court of equity will take care that the party who marries on the faith of such a proposal is not disappointed, and will give effect to the proposal."

In Hammersley v. De Biel (1) the proposal was made on behalf of the intended wife's father by his authority, and was reduced into writing, and was to the effect that the father would pay down £10,000 to be settled on the intended husband and wife and their children, the husband to secure a jointure of £500 a year to the wife if she survived him, and then followed the provision on which the question arose, by which the father

"proposes for the present to allow his daughter £200 per annum for her private use . . . and also intends to leave a further sum of £10,000 in his will to Miss Thomson to be settled on her and her children."

After the father's death, without having made the promised provision by will, the only child of the marriage, her mother having died before her father, instituted a suit in equity against his grandfather's executors to recover £10,000 out of his assets; LORD LANGDALE, M.R., held that by acceptance the proposal had "ripened into an agreement," and that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief she prayed, i.e., to the sum of £10,000 with interest at 4 per cent. from the end of one year after the father's death, on the footing of a legacy. LORD COTTENHAM affirmed this decision, saying this (12 Cl. & Fin. at p. 62 n.):

"I propose first to consider whether there was any such agreement previous to the marriage of the plaintiff's father and mother as was binding on the late Mr. Thomson, to give an additional £10,000 as the portion of his daughter. If it be supposed to be necessary for this purpose to find a contract such as usually accompanies transactions of importance in the pecuniary affairs of mankind there may not be found in the memorandum or in the other evidence in the cause proof of any such contract; and this may have led to the defence set up by the defendants; but when the authorities on this subject are attended to it will be found that no such formal contract is required."

This was affirmed in the House of Lords by LYNDHURST, L.C., and LORDS BROUGHAM and CAMPBELL, without calling upon the respondents. We have examined the case closely, because it is of the highest authority, not merely as a judgment of the House of Lords, but because it was decided by some of the best equity lawyers of that time. LORD ST. LEONARDS has criticised the decision on the ground that the memorandum in that case might have been construed as a mere expression of an intention, not as a definite proposal which could by acceptance ripen into a contract: SUGDEN'S LAW OF PROPERTY at p. 53. But he does not intimate a doubt that the decision was right if the proposal was not merely of an intention which might be changed. Therefore a definite proposal in writing, so as to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, to leave property by will, made to induce a marriage and accepted, and the marriage made on the faith of it, will be enforced in equity.

Then what is the remedy? When the proposal relates to a defined piece of real property, we have no doubt of the power of the court to decree a conveyance of that property, after the death of the person making the proposal, against all who claim under him as volunteers. It is argued that a court of equity cannot compel a man to make a will; but neither can they compel him to execute a deed. They, however, can decree the heir or devisee, in such a case, to convey the land to the widow for life, and, under the Trustee Acts, can make a vesting order and direct that someone shall convey for him if he refuses. And, under like circumstances, the court has power to make a declaration of the plaintiff's rights; but counsel do not press for such relief or ask for a declaration to bind the house and land. The relief they ask is damages for breach of contract.

It seems to be proved that the grantees of the property under the deeds executed by the defendant took without notice of the letter. They acquired, as we understand, the legal estate by the grant. If there was any valuable consideration moving from them, no relief in the nature of specific performance could be given against them, and it is suggested that, the property being partly leasehold, according to the decision in Price v. Jenkins (2), there was such valuable consideration. It is not necessary to examine this argument, as counsel elect to ask for damages only. The defendant had all his lifetime to perform this contract, but in order to perform it he must in his lifetime make a disposition in favour of the plaintiff. If he died without having done so, he would have broken his contract. The breach would be omitting in his lifetime to make such a disposition. True, it would only

A take effect at his death; but the breach must take place in his lifetime; and as, by the conveyance to his daughters, he put it absolutely out of his power to perform this contract, the plaintiff, according to the well-known decisions of Hochster v. De La Tour (3) and Frost v. Knight (4), had a right to treat that conveyance as an absolute breach of contract, and to sue at once for damages; and as this court has both legal and equitable jurisdiction, we are of opinion that such relief should be granted.

B We have not before us the material for assessing such damages. The amount must depend on the value of the possible life estate which the plaintiff would be entitled to if she survived the defendant. Their comparative ages would, of course, be a chief factor in such a calculation. There must be an inquiry as to the proper amount of damages. The defendant must pay the costs of the action here and in the court below.

Appeal allowed.

THOMSON AND OTHERS v. CLYDESDALE BANK, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Herschell, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Morris and Lord Shand), June 23, 26, 1893]

1 R. 255]

Bank—Duty of bank—Inquiry as to customer's right to money paid in—Stockbroker's account—Cheque paid in ordinary course of business—Proceeds of sale of clients' stock—Account overdrawn—Right of bank to retain money as against stockbroker's clients.

G

Debt—Payment—Payment with money received by debtor on account of other person—Validity—Right of creditor to retain as against other person.

Even if a person receiving money knows that that money has been received by the person paying it to him on account of a third person, that of itself, in the absence of notice of any fraud or irregularity connected with the payment, is not sufficient to prevent the payment being a good payment, properly discharging the debt due from the person paying the money to the person who receives it and giving the latter a right to retain the money as against the third person.

H

A stockbroker was instructed by clients to sell certain of their stock and to re-invest the proceeds of the sale. He received payment for the stock sold by a cheque payable to himself, which he paid into his own bank to the credit of his own account, which was overdrawn. The bankers knew that he was a stockbroker, and believed that the money was in his hands as acting for clients in the ordinary way of business.

I

Held: the bankers were entitled to retain the money as against the stockbroker's clients, there being no evidence of mala fides, or of anything to put them on inquiry.

Appeal from a decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, reported 18 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 751, affirming unanimously a judgment of the Lord Ordinary. D

Thomson, a stockbroker in Edinburgh, kept a current account with the Clydesdale Bank, Ltd., at George Street, Edinburgh, and at Lombard Street, London. The account was opened in the beginning of January, 1889. Frequent operations took place on the account, it was sometimes at debit and sometimes at credit, until March, 1890. In February, 1890, the trustees of Thomas Dunlop instructed Thomson to sell fifty shares held by them in the Commercial Bank of Scotland and to invest the proceeds in their name in colonial securities. The shares were sold by Thomson who received the buying broker's cheque in his favour for the price plus certain sums for commission and other charges. On March 19, 1890, Thomson paid the cheque into his bank account. At that time the account stood at debit to the extent of £4,870 15s. 1d. Thomson requested that of the amount of the cheque £2,000 should be placed to his credit in his Edinburgh account and £900 to his London account. When this was done his account still stood at debit, and it remained still at debit when, a few days later, Thomson absconded. It was proved that everything done by Thomson was in consonance with the ordinary course of business, and that nothing was done which could excite the suspicion of the bank or lead them to suppose that Thomson, their customer, was not entitled to pay the cheque in to the credit of his bank account. On an action by the trustees to recover the sum of £2,900 from the bank, the courts below decided in favour of the bank, and the trustees thereupon brought the present appeal. E

The Lord Advocate (Balfour, Q.C.) and Finlay, Q.C., for the trustees. F

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Ure (of the Scottish Bar) for the bank, were not called on to argue. G

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., stated the facts and continued: It cannot be questioned that under ordinary circumstances a person, be he banker or other, who takes money from a third person in discharge of a debt, is not bound to inquire into the manner in which the person so paying the debt acquired the money with which he pays it. However that money may have been acquired by the person making the payment, the person taking that payment is entitled to retain it in discharge of the liability which is due to him. But it is said that in the present case the bankers took with notice that the sum which they received was money not belonging to their debtor personally, but one which he held or had received for other persons, and that, having had this knowledge or notice, they are not entitled to retain it in discharge of Mr. Thomson's debt. H

I cannot assent to the proposition that, even if a person receiving money knows that that money has been received by the person paying it to him on account of I

A other persons, that of itself is sufficient to prevent the payment being a good payment, properly discharging the debt due from the person paying the money to the person who receives it. No doubt, if the person receiving the money has reason to believe that the payment is being made in fraud of a third person, and that the person making the payment is handing over in discharge of his debt money which he has no right to hand over, then the person taking such payment would not be entitled to retain the money, upon the ordinary principles which I need not dwell upon. But in the present case there appears to me to be an absolute absence of any evidence of that kind. Reliance is placed, on behalf of the trustees, entirely upon the answer given by the manager of the bank, which was in these terms:

C "I made no inquiry as to whether the money paid in to Mr. Thomson's account was in his hands as broker or otherwise. I believe that it was in his hands as broker acting for clients. (Q) And that, I suppose, would be your belief generally when he made payments into his account of a large amount? (A) Yes. (Q) Did you know whether or not Mr. Thomson was engaged in a speculative account of his own? (A) I had not the least knowledge. (Q) For anything you knew the cheques may have been paid in for dealings in which he was principal? (A) We believed that the cheques were just paid in in the ordinary course of business. (Q) As money belonging to him or at his disposal? (A) Yes."

D That is the whole of the evidence upon which reliance is placed, and it seems to me that so far from proving the case sought to be set up on behalf of the trustees it really proves the contrary.

E The only point which I have not mentioned, upon which stress was laid, is this, that in the bank books Mr. Thomson is described as a stockbroker; therefore, it was said, his account would be understood to be one relating to matters in which he was acting for principals, and that that, coupled with the answers which I have mentioned, is sufficient to establish the trustees' case. If a stockbroker who was receiving money in respect of transactions for his clients could never properly pay it to his account in discharge of liabilities incurred, there might be something in the case of the trustees; but obviously that is not so. A stockbroker may make advances to his clients in anticipation of sums which he will receive from them. In that case it is perfectly legitimate, he having obtained for that purpose an advance from his bankers, that when he receives the money from his clients he should pay it to his bankers for the purpose of reinstating the account he has overdrawn.

G Therefore it is clear that there may well be cases in which a stockbroker, having overdrawn his account, may properly pay money which he has received from his clients into that account. It is obvious that the case of the trustees wholly fails unless they bring home to the bankers much more than has been attempted here, namely, a knowledge that in the particular case the person was not justified in paying over the particular amount. Of course, if they prove that there was such knowledge on the part of the bankers, the bankers could not retain it. It seems to me that if, because an account is opened with bankers by a stockbroker, they are bound to inquire into the source from which he receives any money which he pays in, it would be wholly impossible that the business could be carried on, and I know of no principle or authority for it. I confess, therefore, with all respect for the learned judge who took a different view in the court below, that it seems to me a very clear case. For these reasons I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion as the Lord Chancellor, and for the same reasons. When a broker, or other agent entrusted with the possession and apparent ownership of money, pays it away in the ordinary course of his business, for onerous consideration, I regard it as settled law that a transaction which is fraudulent as between the agent and his employer will bind the latter, unless he can show that the recipient of the money did not transact in good faith with his agent. In this case a broker, employed by the trustees to sell stock and invest the proceeds, sold, and received payment of the price, by a cheque of the purchasing broker payable to himself. He then passed the cheque to the credit of his current account with the bank, which at the time was largely overdrawn. The course thus followed was a usual one, and in strict accordance with the practice of the Edinburgh Stock Exchange. The payment to the bank was onerous in so far as concerned the bankers, because whenever made, it operated in law as a discharge by them pro tanto of the broker's liability for the debit balance on his account. The broker knew that he was insolvent, and that he was using his customer's money to pay his own debt to the bank, without any reasonable expectation of his being able to replace it. That was an undoubted fraud upon the trustees; but, in my opinion, the broker's fraud is of no relevancy in this case, unless it is coupled with bad faith on the part of the bankers. The onus of proving that they acted mala fide rests with the trustees. It is not enough for them to prove that the bankers acted negligently; in order to succeed they must establish that the bankers knew, not only that the money represented by the cheque did not belong to the broker, but that he had no authority from the true owner to pay it into his bank account. The trustees have, in my opinion, failed to prove either of these cardinal facts. I do not think it necessary to examine the evidence, and shall content myself with a reference to the note of the Lord Ordinary, which deals with the facts of the case, and the law applicable to them, to my entire satisfaction.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to be clear that the broker employed by the trustees acted not only in violation of his duty and obligation as their agent, but also fraudulently. He had special instructions from the trustees to invest the price to be received for the bank shares sold, but in place of doing so he paid the amount received to the bankers in the reduction of the balance then due by him to them on his account. Such a payment might have been made in the hope and with the intention of afterwards drawing the amount for the purpose of investing it as directed. The broker's conduct and the pecuniary circumstances in which he was placed, lead, however, to the inference that he had no such hope or intention, but seem to support the conclusion that he fraudulently applied the money to the payment of his own debt, in order to gain time to make arrangements for absconding as he did a few days afterwards.

But the breach of obligation or fraud of the broker alone cannot entitle the trustees to recover from the bankers the amount of the payment made to them. The trustees entrusted the broker with the money to be employed as they had directed. It is proved, and it is indeed well known, that a broker, according to the ordinary practice as to payment of the price of shares sold, receives the cheque of the buying broker, and in the first instance places the amount to the credit of his own bank account. Thereafter he gives a cheque on his own bank account to his employers for the amount received less his charges, or he gives his cheques to others if, as in this case, he has directions to make re-investments. In this way the broker has the possession of the money and the power of disposal which possession gives, and it is in accordance with the usual practice that the money should be mixed with and form part of his general funds. He has thus the opportunity, and may take advantage of this, to misapply and to appropriate to his own use the money entrusted to him by a customer, and the principal's only remedy lies against his agent whom he has so trusted. Where questions arise with third parties into whose hands the money can be traced, as in this instance, liability against them for recovery of the money misapplied arises only where it can be shown directly, or as the reasonable inference from facts proved, that these parties were cognisant that the money was being wrongfully used in violation of the agent's duty and obligation.

Accordingly it was not maintained in the argument in the present case that if

A the agent had employed the money in question, or a large part of it, in the payment of debts due by him to the different tradesmen with whom he might have dealt, in ignorance on their part of any violation of his obligation to employ the funds otherwise, the trustees would have had any claim excepting against the agent himself. Indeed, although a different view was at first maintained, it seemed to be conceded before the close of the argument that the same principle must apply B to the ordinary case of bankers with whom stockbrokers deal, and with whom they keep their bank accounts; and the argument for the trustees was rested entirely on the special circumstances said to exist in this case.

However this may be, I am of opinion that the same principle which applies to third parties generally is equally applicable to the case of dealings between stockbrokers and their bankers, and that the only circumstances in which money C misapplied by a broker in payment to the banker of a debt due to him can be recovered from the banker by the principal to whom the money belonged, is where it can be shown directly or by inference from the facts proved that the banker or his representative in the transaction knew that the money was being misapplied. It has been shown in the present case, and indeed is notorious, that a stockbroker is often in advance for his customers, and that on settlement days and at other D times he may require temporary advances which will in due course be repaid shortly afterwards when the broker receives payment of the prices of stocks sold and delivered by him. Accordingly the knowledge of the banker that money paid in by which a broker reduces or extinguishes an overdraft on his account consists of the prices received for customers' stocks delivered, or of the price of stock belonging to a particular customer, is nothing more than knowledge of what is E constantly occurring in the ordinary course of business. The broker may or may not owe the price to his principal. In the general case he does, but in others he may have already advanced the amount to his principal, and he may have had other stock transactions which leave a balance in the broker's favour, or the arrangement between the parties may be that the broker is to retain the fund for an interval of more or less time for the purpose of re-investment or otherwise.

F It appears to me that it would be impossible that such business could be carried on if it were held to be obligatory on a banker, in order to save himself from the consequences of a possible breach of duty or obligation or of the fraud of an agent to his principal, that the banker should examine into the particulars of the various transactions resulting in the payments by brokers or agents to the credit of their accounts on each occasion on which such payments are made; and that the only G rule that can be applied in practice, and one which, as I think, rests on sound principle is that liability for repayment of funds which can be traced or followed into the banker's hands and have been applied in payment of the agent's debt, shall arise only where it can be shown that there was knowledge, on the banker's part, not merely that the fund was received from the broker's principal, but knowledge also that the payment was a misapplication of the fund, made in violation H of the agent's duty and obligation.

With regard to the specialties which are founded on in this case as distinguishing it from the general case, it appears to me, after full consideration of the argument of the trustees, that the case fails. The only specialty, I think, that was latterly founded on was that the overdrawn account was said to have got into what is called a chronic condition, that is to say, that for a considerable length of time the I balance had been steadily against the broker. I do not know that, however much that might be so, it would make a difference in the result of the case; but, on looking over the broker's account, which we have before us for fifteen months from Jan. 2, 1889, I find that, consisting as it does of about twelve pages of closely printed matter, there is a constant and fluctuating balance throughout almost the whole period. At one time the balance was a good deal against the broker; at another time it was somewhat in his favour: but so recently as Mar. 15, 1890, the transaction in question having occurred on March 19, 1890, I find that the total amount to the broker's debit was the sum of £1,285. I can see nothing suspicious in the state of the broker's account and nothing to indicate to the bankers that any funds to be now paid in to wipe out the balance in whole or in part were being obtained by any fraud, and I agree with the Lord Chancellor in thinking that there is no evidence whatever here which could have put the bankers on inquiry or can be founded on as showing that they must have believed or known that this was a misapplication of funds.

A number of authorities were referred to in the argument. The only one which has not been dealt with in the court below, I think, is London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons (1). That case does not appear to me to have any very direct application to the present, because there there was, if I mistake not, an onerous transaction at the time; there was value given for the securities taken; while here it cannot be said that there was any value given in return for the money that was paid in. The circumstances were not the same; there was a different state of things. But in that case there are undoubtedly a number of dicta of the judges which have a bearing upon the present case. As to the other authorities, and, indeed, as to the facts of the case, I agree with LORD WATSON in thinking that they are most satisfactorily dealt with in the able and short judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The test whether or not a liquidator is liable to pay rates in respect of company premises retained by him after the commencement of the liquidation is whether there is "beneficial occupation" within the meaning of the rating statutes. Where there is such occupation the liquidator is bound to pay in full the rates becoming due after the commencement of the liquidation, and in default of that payment liberty to distrain ought to be granted.

Application in the winding-up of the Blazer Fire Lighter, Ltd., by the Vestry of St. Mary, Islington, to discharge an order restraining them from levying a distress on the company's premises in respect of certain rates which had been made by them after the date of the commencement of the winding-up.

The company occupied for the purposes of their business certain leasehold premises at 232A, York Road, in the parish of St. Mary, Islington, for which it had paid rates since March, 1891. On Mar. 2, 1894, the company passed an extraordinary resolution for a voluntary liquidation, and appointing a liquidator. At that date the company had for some time ceased to carry on its business. The liquidator shortly after his appointment took possession of the company's premises, and placed them in charge of a caretaker, who remained in possession solely in order to prevent trespass upon or injury to the property, and not with a view of carrying on the business of the company or of selling it as a going concern, though the liquidator intended as soon as possible to sell the premises and the plant. No profit or benefit whatever was derived by him on behalf of the company from retaining such possession; but, on the contrary, the cost of preservation was incurred. On Mar. 24, 1894, after the commencement of the winding-up, the vestry made a poor rate, a lighting rate, a general rate, and a sewers rate for the half-year ending Sept. 29, 1894, payable in two portions on April 2, 1894, and July 2, 1894, respectively. In April, 1894, the vestry's collector left a demand note for £3 2s. 4d., being the first portion of the rates, with the caretaker, and in July a demand note for £3 2s. 4d., being the second portion of such rates. On May 29, 1894, the liquidator was served with a magistrate's summons for the amount of the rates. The liquidator opposed this summons; but an order was made for the payment of the rates forthwith, and the vestry threatened to distrain for the amount thereof on the company's premises. On June 20, 1894, the liquidator applied to ROMER, J., who was then sitting for VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., for an order restraining the vestry until further order from levying a distress upon the property for the payment of the rates. His LORDSHIP made an order on the undertaking of the liquidator to be personally answerable for damages. The premises and plant were sold by the liquidator on Sept. 6, 1894.

The present summons asked that the order of ROMER, J., might be discharged, and that the liquidator might be ordered to pay the vestry £6 6s. 6d., or such damages as the court should be of opinion that they had sustained by reason of the order. The summons was adjourned into court to be treated as a motion. It appeared from the evidence of the vestry's collector that, when he called for payment of the rates in April and June, there was sufficient plant upon the premises, if distrained upon, to raise the amount of the rates.

J. G. Wood for the liquidator.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I think that the parish authorities are entitled to have these rates paid in full. That is, in other words, I think they ought to be allowed to distrain for them, and that I ought to discharge the order restraining them from so doing, and to leave them to their rights on that basis. A

There has been a considerable difference of opinion in the various cases cited, and I do not think that any amount of legal ingenuity could maintain the proposition that all the judgments can stand together. I certainly give up that task. I am going to adopt the view of BOWEN, L.J., in Re National Arms and Ammunition Co. (2). No later case than that has been cited to me. I do not say that that is a decision of the Court of Appeal in favour of the view I am about to take; but BACON, V.-C., had suggested in Re West Hartlepool Iron Co., Ltd., Ex parte West Hartlepool Improvement Comrs. (3), that the test of whether the rates were payable in full was whether there had been a beneficial enjoyment by the liquidator, mere possession or occupation not being sufficient. Upon that BOWEN, L.J., says (28 Ch.D. at p. 482): B C

“I wish to add that I am not satisfied that the test given by BACON, V.-C., in Re West Hartlepool Iron Co. (3) is the true one. I am disposed to think that the true test is, whether there has been a beneficial occupation within the ordinary meaning of those words in cases as to rating, and I wish to leave this question open in case it should ever call for decision.” D

I intend to adopt that view. It is not contended here, and it could not be contended, that if that test is adopted there has been a beneficial occupation within the ordinary meaning of the term in the cases as to rating. I thought that possibly there might be a dispute as to that, so I referred during the course of the argument to the provisions of the rating statutes upon which there have been decisions as to what is a beneficial occupation. It is not, however, necessary to consider that point, as it is admitted that in this case there has been a beneficial occupation within the ordinary meaning of the words used in those statutes. E

Having said that I am going to adopt the view of BOWEN, L.J., I should like to give the reasons which have led me to that conclusion. The Companies Acts take away the power of distress upon the property of a company after the commencement of a winding-up; but they give the court a discretion to allow the distress to go on. The question therefore is, whether the court should in its discretion allow it to go on in this case. It is admitted that the rate, in so far as it constitutes a debt, constituted a debt which was incurred after and not before the liquidation, so that it is not a case in which it can be said that the persons to whom the rate is due ought to come in and prove pari passu with the other persons who were creditors at the date of the liquidation. The vestry are creditors; they have become so since the commencement of the liquidation. I confess that I cannot see why a debt for rates should not be paid just as much as a debt for rent of premises or in respect of anything else which a liquidator thinks it necessary to acquire or use after the commencement of the liquidation. He may have to hire new premises, in which case he would have to pay the rent in full; or he may have to occupy the old premises, and keep the landlord out of possession. If he does that he would have to pay also. In either case, whether he acquires new premises or continues to hold the old ones, he would have to pay the rates in respect of the occupation which he has. Under these circumstances, I think that the test proposed by BOWEN, L.J., is much the plainest and simplest, namely, has there been a beneficial occupation by the liquidator of these premises within the ordinary meaning of the words in the rating statutes? and it cannot be disputed that in this case there has been such occupation. F G H I

Having said that, I wish to make one observation about the effect of the decision of the court as distinguished from the observations of the judges in Re National Arms and Ammunition Co. (2). It seems to me that, after the decision in that case, it is impossible to say that the decision in Re Watson, Kipling & Co. (1) can stand, in so far as it draws any distinction between rates and rent. I think that

A all the lords justices in Re National Arms and Ammunition Co. (2) decided that case on the basis that rates must for this purpose be dealt with as being upon the same footing; but even if this were a case of rent, counsel for the liquidator could not be heard to say that the rent would not be payable in full if there was only an occupation for the purpose of obtaining a good price, even though the premises might be used in the meantime for the storage of the plant and machinery of the company. Certainly, that does not seem to be warranted by anything laid down by B KAY, J., in Re Watson, Kipling & Co. (1). He says there (23 Ch.D. at p. 507):

“I am not satisfied that the question of the payment of rates should be determined on absolutely the same principle as that of the payment of rent due to a landlord, because there is this difference, as was pointed out by Mr. Rigby, and I agree that it is a substantial distinction; in the case of a landlord the company occupying his property are keeping him out of possession, and if the company have, and deliberately exercise, enjoyment of the property of the landlord, no doubt the rent ought to be paid in full.”

C I should say that he means by that that, if the liquidator chooses to occupy premises while waiting to get a good price, he would have to pay the rent in full, and I do not think that counsel for the liquidator can rely upon that judgment in support of his argument.

This case is really unarguable unless one is to fall back upon the test laid down by BACON, V.-C. According to that, mere possession or occupation is not sufficient to make the liquidator liable; but there must be some beneficial enjoyment also. It seems to me that, having regard to the subsequent cases, that case can no longer stand. In Re Oak Pits Colliery Co. (4) LINDLEY, L.J., says (21 Ch.D. at p. 331):

“No authority has yet gone the length of deciding that a landlord is entitled to distrain for, or be paid in full, rent accruing since the commencement of the winding-up, where the liquidator has done nothing except abstain from trying to get rid of the property which the company holds as lessee.”

F He does not, however, go to the length of affirming the test laid down by BACON, V.-C. It seems to me that, if the liquidator deliberately chooses to occupy the premises because he thinks he may get a better price by waiting before selling them, and a loss to the company would be avoided by his so waiting, he must pay the rates in respect of his occupation in full. The order of June 20 must therefore be discharged.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of LAWRENCE, J., on the trial with a jury of an action to recover damages for an alleged libel.

The defendants, Messrs. Goblet Frères, alleged that a debt was due to them from the plaintiff, and instructed their solicitors to take steps to obtain payment of that debt. The solicitors wrote a letter to the plaintiff demanding payment of the alleged debt, and making statements defamatory of the plaintiff. This letter was dictated by the solicitors to a shorthand clerk by whom it was transcribed; it was then copied by another clerk into the letter-book.

At the trial before LAWRENCE, J., and a jury, the jury found that the defendants honestly and bona fide believed in the truth of the statements made in the letter.

A A verdict was found for the plaintiff with damages, and judgment entered accordingly. The defendants appealed.

Montague Lush and R. J. McNeill for the defendants.

Blake Odgers, Q.C., and H. A. Forman for the plaintiff.

B LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this action for libel we have to consider whether there has been a miscarriage of justice, and whether there ought not to have been a verdict and judgment for the defendants.

C In Pullman v. Hill & Co. (1) we held in this court that, if a merchant writes about a customer or other person a libel which if sent to the customer himself would be sent upon a privileged occasion, and dictates it to a clerk in his office, or gives it to a clerk to copy, that is a publication to the clerk, and is not written D on a privileged occasion at all. We so held upon the ground that it is not within the ordinary course of the business of a merchant to write defamatory letters, and that, if he does write defamatory letters, it is not reasonably necessary in so doing, and is not in the ordinary course of his business, to dictate the letters to, and get them copied by, a clerk in his office. That we laid down in the case of a merchant. The question now arises in the case of a solicitor. In this case a solicitor was instructed by a client to obtain payment of an account for him, and to press for payment of that account to the extent of telling the debtor that he is seeking to evade payment by a shabby or criminal trick, and he wrote to the debtor to that effect.

E The first point taken is, that doing this was not part of the ordinary business of a solicitor. We overruled that objection in Baker v. Carrick (2) because of the knowledge of business which we possess, especially as to legal practice. We said that it was part of the ordinary business of a solicitor before action to endeavour to obtain payment for his client by threatening to take proceedings of some kind. That being so, this solicitor was instructed to do that very thing, to obtain payment and to threaten legal proceedings. What he did, then, was in the ordinary
F course of his business. It is a usual and frequent part of the ordinary business of a solicitor to write defamatory matter relating to those persons to whom the letters are written. Everyone knows that it is so, and that a solicitor could not perform his duty to his clients without doing it. That distinguishes the case of a solicitor from that of a merchant who has no such duty to perform. We held in Baker v. Carrick (2) that if what is written by the solicitor would, if written by the client, be written upon a privileged occasion, then the occasion is privileged on the part
G of the solicitor. This solicitor, therefore, being instructed by the client to obtain payment of his account by pressure, if the letter if written by the client would have been written on a privileged occasion, it was written by the solicitor upon a privileged occasion. In this case, therefore, the letter was written to the plaintiff upon a privileged occasion on the part of the solicitor because, if Goblet Frères had written it, it would have been written on a privileged occasion.

H This letter, then, was written by the solicitor upon a privileged occasion. It is said, however, that the solicitor could not claim the privilege as between himself and the shorthand and copying clerk, in his office. Upon consideration that point seems to come to this: It was the duty of the solicitor to write this letter. Does it not follow that it was his duty to do so in the ordinary reasonably necessary way
I of performing that duty? A solicitor has duties to perform for many clients, and he has to perform all those duties with due diligence. The court, knowing what is the usual and necessary practice of a solicitor's office, is prepared to say, even without the assistance of the jury, that the court can hold that a solicitor, who had been instructed to write defamatory matter on behalf of a client, is allowed to do so in the ordinary and reasonably necessary manner of performing his duty to his client, and that that involves having such communications copied by a clerk. It has often been held that it is the proper mode of doing business in a solicitor's office to have letters copied. This case, therefore, is distinguishable from that of a merchant. When a merchant writes his own letters, it is no part of his business as a merchant to write libels at all, and not, therefore, to have them dictated to or copied by a clerk. If he does so, he does it at his risk. A solicitor, however, is bound to do so in performing his duty to his client. It is consonant with justice and good sense to hold that, in doing what he is obliged to do in the ordinary course of business for the purpose of performing his duty to his client, he is doing it on a privileged occasion. I think that where he is doing what would be done on a privileged occasion for him as regards the person written to, it being his duty to do it for his client, and it being a reasonable and necessary manner of carrying out his duty to his client to dictate the letter and have it copied, if he does it in that way, the occasion is clearly privileged, and he is not liable in an action for libel unless malice in fact is proved. In this case the jury found that there was no malice in fact, and the defendants are therefore entitled to judgment.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Two questions are raised in this case. The first is, whether there was any evidence of the publication of the libel; and the second is, whether the occasion of publication was a privileged occasion. As to publication, it appears to me that there was evidence of publication of the defamatory matter to third persons; that is, to the clerks in the solicitor's office. The libel, therefore, was published by the defendants.

The other question is one of more importance and difficulty. It is difficult to define in a general way what is a privileged occasion, and to say what kind or amount of duty or interest is necessary in all cases to make an occasion privileged. For the purposes of the present case I am prepared to lay down this rule: that, if a communication made by a solicitor to a third party is reasonably necessary and usual in the discharge of his duty to his client, and in the interest of his client, the occasion is privileged.

There would be no doubt in this case if the publication had been directly to the plaintiff, but the difficulty arises because the communication was not made directly by the solicitor to the plaintiff, but through a clerk. It is said that there was no privileged occasion as between the solicitor and his clerks. In my opinion that occasion was privileged. I think that it was reasonably necessary for the solicitor to make the communication to his clerk, and that it was usual for him to do so in discharge of his duty to his client, and in the interest of his client. We have been much pressed in argument with Pullman v. Hill (1), which to some extent was a novel decision. That case, however, is clearly distinguishable. The whole ground of the decision in that case was that it was not in the usual course of a merchant's business to write defamatory matter and to communicate it to his clerks. I adhere to what I said in that case, as follows ([1891] 1 Q.B. at p. 530):

"It is said that business cannot be carried on if merchants may not employ their clerks to write letters for them in the ordinary course of business. I think the answer to this is very simple. I have never yet heard that it is in the usual course of a merchant's business to write letters containing defamatory statements. If a merchant has occasion to write such a letter he must write it himself, and make a copy of it himself, or he must take the consequences."

I venture to think that there is nothing wrong in that statement. The course of business in a solicitor's office is entirely different. It would be impossible to carry on the business of a solicitor unless defamatory matter was sometimes communicated to clerks in the office. That is the usual course of business in a solicitor's office. I am of opinion, therefore, that this occasion was privileged. If the occasion was privileged, the plaintiff must fail unless there is evidence of malice in fact. The jury have found that there was no malice in fact. The communication, therefore, was privileged, and the defendants are entitled to verdict and judgment.

A DAVEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This case is distinguishable from Pullman v. Hill (1) upon the grounds which have been stated, and I think that our decision in this case is justified by the earlier authorities, and by good sense.

H Appeal by the plaintiff, J. Rogers, from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., refusing to grant him relief against the forfeiture of a lease by the defendant landlord, Charles Rice, jun.

By an indenture, dated July 17, 1861, Charles Rice granted to William Nash Round, his executors, administrators, and assigns, by the direction and at the request of James Church, a lease of a piece of land with the messuage and premises thereon erected, known as No. 5, Sutherland Terrace, Coldharbour Lane, Brixton, for the term of seventy-two years, less ten days, from Dec. 25, 1850, at the yearly rent after the first half-year of such term of £7 payable quarterly.

I The lease contained certain covenants to repair, and also a clause for re-entry on the rent or any part thereof being in arrear for six months or not paid within one calendar month after the same became due and demanded by a notice in writing delivered to W. H. Round, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or fixed upon some conspicuous part of the premises; and also a clause for re-entry in case the premises should be suffered to be dilapidated or out of repair to the value of £20 or upwards and not repaired within three calendar months after notice in writing for that purpose should have been delivered or affixed as thereinbefore mentioned. A

On May 4, 1855, Charles Rice died, having by his will devised all his interest and estate of and in No. 5, Sutherland Terrace, to his widow Catherine Rice. On Dec. 22, 1890, Catherine Rice died. Charles Rice, jun., was the sole executor of the will of Catherine Rice, and her interest in No. 5, Sutherland Terrace, became vested in him. In 1875 the interest of W. N. Round under the lease was purchased by Mrs. Rogers, but since about the year 1881 her son J. Rogers had paid the rent of the premises, and had become practically the lessee thereof. In 1890 the premises became dilapidated, and were out of such repair as was required by the covenant in the lease. Accordingly, on Sept. 4, 1890, Rice duly served on Rogers notice, pursuant to the Conveyancing Act, 1881, specifying the breaches complained of, and requiring him to remedy the same, and requiring him to make compensation in money for such breaches, but Rogers failed so to do within a reasonable time. B

On Feb. 13, 1891, Rice commenced an action against Rogers in the Queen's Bench Division for recovery of possession of the premises in accordance with the proviso for re-entry contained in the lease, and claiming the sums of £5 2s. 4d. for arrears of rent and £50 damages for dilapidation; also mesne profits, and costs. Rogers appeared thereto in person, and Rice subsequently delivered a statement of claim, and on Mar. 13, 1891, Rogers delivered a statement of defence therein, in which he denied Rice's right of action, or that the house was out of repair so as to entitle Rice in such an action to sue. On July 18, 1891, the action came on for trial, when Rogers did not appear, he being absent from London not expecting his case to be reached, and judgment was given for recovery of possession of the premises by Rice, and also for £5 2s. 4d. rent and £50 damages and costs to be paid by Rogers to Rice. A writ of possession was issued on July 25, 1891, and on July 28, 1891, possession of the premises was delivered by the sheriff to Rice. The costs were taxed, and Rice endeavoured, without success, to obtain payment of the taxed amount and of the rent and damages. In August, 1891, Rogers applied to the Queen's Bench Division to extend the time for moving to set aside the verdict and judgment obtained in the action of Rice v. Rogers, and that such verdict and judgment might be set aside; but that application the court refused to grant. On Nov. 10, 1891, Rogers commenced the present action of Rogers v. Rice by originating summons in the Chancery Division, asking, under s. 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, for relief against the re-entry or forfeiture. C

"(1) A right of re-entry or forfeiture under any proviso or stipulation in a lease, for a breach of any covenant or condition in the lease, shall not be enforceable, by action or otherwise, unless and until the lessor serves on the lessee a notice specifying the particular breach complained of, and, if the breach is capable of remedy, requiring the lessee to remedy the breach, and, in any case, requiring the lessee to make compensation in money for the breach, and the lessee fails, within a reasonable time thereafter, to remedy the breach, if it is capable of remedy, and to make reasonable compensation in money, to the satisfaction of the lessor, for the breach. (2) Where a lessor is proceeding, by action or otherwise, to enforce such a right of re-entry or forfeiture, the lessee may, in the lessor's action, if any, or in any action brought by himself, apply to the court for relief; and the court may grant or refuse relief, as the court, having regard to the proceedings and conduct of the parties under the foregoing provisions of this section, and to all the other circumstances, thinks fit; and in case of relief may grant it on such terms, if any, as to costs, expenses, damages, compensation, penalty, or otherwise, including the granting of an injunction to restrain any like breach in the future, as the court, in the circumstances of each case, thinks fit." E

A On Feb. 5, 1892, the summons came on to be heard before KEKEWICH, J., and he dismissed the summons. From that decision Rogers now appealed.

Warmington, Q.C., and W. Baugh Allen for the defendant Rice.

B LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of KEKEWICH, J., should be affirmed. It seems to me quite clear that this is a case to which sub-s. (2) of s. 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, does not apply. A proper notice under sub-s. (1) was given by the lessor, and he proceeded to enforce the forfeiture of the lease. The action was not hurried on and the judgment was not snapped, but the lessee took no steps to prevent the forfeiture. The action proceeded to judgment and execution, so far at least as regards recovery of possession. As to re-entry the C “proceeding” has been taken by the lessor, and has been successful. It is not a case of a lessor “proceeding” to enforce his right. He has proceeded to enforce it and has enforced it, and it is now too late, therefore, for the lessee to seek relief. On the words of the Act alone, I should have said that it was perfectly clear that it was too late now to apply for relief against the forfeiture.

D I cannot help saying that the point, though not actually before the judges of the Court of Appeal for decision in Quilter v. Mapleson (1), was clearly present to their minds, and was considered by them and commented upon in a sense adverse to the claim of the plaintiff. BOWEN, L.J., expressed his opinion almost in the words which I adopt as my own as to the proper construction of the Act. The plaintiff has come too late. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

E LINDLEY, L.J.—This case seems to me to be almost too plain for argument when once the facts are understood. North London Freehold Land and House Co. v. Jacques (2) before BACON, V.-C., which has been cited, is obviously distinguishable from the present case, because there the proper notice had not been given. It was an informal notice. But here that was not so.

F KAY, L.J.—I entirely agree. I have nothing to add.

Bankruptcy—Infant—Partnership—Receiving order against partnership firm—Liability of infant—Form of order.

An infant may become a partner in a trading firm, but he cannot contract debts for goods supplied to the firm, and cannot be made subject to the bankruptcy laws in respect of any debt contracted by the firm. He is not entitled to any share of the partnership assets till the debts of the firm are paid.

In a case in which judgment had been obtained and a receiving order made against a firm in the partnership name, in which one of the partners was an infant,

Held: the receiving order against the firm could not stand in that form, but the order and the judgment might be amended by adding after the firm name "other than" the infant partner.

C Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LOPES and KAY, L.J.J.), reported, [1894] 1 Q.B. 1, setting aside a receiving order made by a registrar in bankruptcy against the respondents.

D At the date of the petition the respondent, Gilbert Walter Beauchamp, an infant, was a partner in the firm of Beauchamp Brothers, who carried on business as provision dealers in the Brompton Road, in the county of London. The appellants were provision merchants, and on Sept. 11, 1893, they presented the petition against Beauchamp Brothers in respect of a judgment debt of £358 for goods sold and delivered, and a receiving order was made by the registrar. The respondent Gilbert Walter Beauchamp appealed, and before the Court of Appeal raised the point that the fact of his infancy rendered the whole proceedings in bankruptcy against him void. The Court of Appeal so held, and they ordered the petition of the appellants to be dismissed with costs.

E Finlay, Q.C., Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Wedderburn for the appellants.
Sir Henry James, Q.C., and A. Powell for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Aug. 14, 1894. The following opinions were read.

F LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—I do not think there can be any doubt as to the substantial rights of the parties in this case. The form which the proceedings have taken gives rise to greater difficulty. The respondent Gilbert Walter Beauchamp, was a partner in the firm of Beauchamp Brothers. He was and is an infant. Goods which had been supplied upon the order of the firm by the appellants not having been paid for, an action was brought against the firm in the firm's name. An appearance was entered for Ralph Beauchamp and for Gilbert Walter Beauchamp, the infant, by his guardian ad litem. The appellants, plaintiffs below, having applied to sign judgment under Ord. 14, it was objected that Gilbert Walter Beauchamp, being an infant, was not liable. An order was, however, made adjudging that the plaintiffs should recover against the defendants, the firm of Beauchamp Brothers, £358 8s. 10d., and costs to be taxed. A judgment having been obtained in the same terms by Harris, another person who had supplied goods to the firm, and issued a writ against them, it was, on an appeal to the Divisional Court to set aside that order, ordered that the defendants' application be dismissed with costs. But it was also ordered that execution was not to issue against the separate property of Gilbert Walter Beauchamp, infant, or against his share, if any, of the partnership profits. The Court of

H

I Appeal refused to disturb the order thus made by the Divisional Court.

On Aug. 7, 1893, the plaintiffs in the action, served a bankruptcy notice on Beauchamp Brothers founded on the judgment, intimating that, if the requisitions of the notice were not complied with, an act of bankruptcy would be committed. The money not having been paid, the appellants Lovell and Christmas, presented a petition for a receiving order in respect of the estate of Beauchamp Brothers. Upon this petition an order was made for the appointment of a receiver. This order was discharged by the Court of Appeal, upon the ground that one of the partners of Beauchamp Brothers being an infant the receiving order could not properly be made against the firm. The Court of Appeal granted leave to appeal to this House, but on the terms that the orders made by the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal in Harris v. Beauchamp (1) should be treated as made also in the action brought by the present appellants. A

I proceed now to state what I conceive to be the true position of the parties. I think it clear that there is nothing to prevent an infant trading or becoming partner with a trader, and that until his contract of partnership be disaffirmed he is a member of the trading firm. But it is equally clear that he cannot contract debts by such trading; although goods may be ordered for the firm he does not become a debtor in respect of them. The adult partner is, however, entitled to insist that the partnership assets shall be applied in payment of the liabilities of the partnership, and that until these are provided for no part of them shall be received by the infant partner, and if the proper steps are taken this right of the adult partner can be made available for the benefit of the creditors. It is also clear that, even if there are circumstances under which an infant may be adjudicated bankrupt, or a receiving order may lawfully be obtained as a step towards such adjudication, he cannot be made subject to the bankruptcy laws in respect of any debts contracted by the firm of which he is a partner. B C

The plaintiffs were, no doubt, entitled to issue a writ against the firm in the firm's name. But it is to be observed that the order [R.S.C., Ord. 48A] which sanctions such a proceeding provides by r. 5 D

"that persons sued as partners in the name of the firm shall appear individually in their own names."

As soon as it appeared that a member of the firm was an infant, I do not think that it was proper to sign judgment against the firm. The Divisional Court appear to have taken the view that, inasmuch as one of the partners was an infant, the firm might be treated for the purposes of the action as consisting only of the other partner, but I do not think this is so. Although an infant he was a partner, and the firm name Beauchamp Brothers applied as much to him as to an adult partner. The Court of Appeal took the view that the judgment against the firm was good, and might be made available against the partnership property, though it would be ineffectual as against the infant partner. I have a difficulty in seeing how it can be supported. Although the judgment may be pronounced against the firm in the firm's name, it is in reality a judgment against all the persons who are in fact members of the firm; and it is because such a judgment exists that the right of execution follows. It cannot be regarded as a judgment merely against the assets of the firm. The right of execution, whatever it may be, arises from the fact that certain persons have been adjudged debtors. I have already said that, in my opinion, the infant could not be so adjudged. It is true that Ord. 48A, r. 8, which sanctions, in a case of a judgment against a firm, execution against the property of the partnership, restricts any further execution except in specified cases without leave of the court or judge. But I do not think this affords warrant for a judgment against a firm including a person who, though a member of the firm, was not a debtor. E F G H

It appears to me, therefore, that the judgment should either have been against Ralph Beauchamp alone or against the firm, excepting Gilbert Walter Beauchamp. If the judgment had been in either one or the other of these forms, a receiving order might no doubt have been obtained, upon the petition of Lovell and Christmas against Ralph Beauchamp, and in the proceedings in bankruptcy the partnership assets might have been made available for those who had given credit to the firm. The respondent insists that the bankruptcy proceedings were properly set aside, inasmuch as the receiving order against the firm would operate under the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 262 [see now 1952 Bankruptcy Rules, r. 285] as if it were a receiving order made against each of the persons who, at the date of the order, was a partner in the firm, and therefore as a receiving order against him. I

A I agree with the courts below in thinking that the receiving order in the form in which it was made by the registrar cannot stand. The question is, under those circumstances, what ought to be done? I am most unwilling, if it can be avoided, to deal with the receiving order in a manner which would liberate Ralph Beauchamp from its operation and render fresh bankruptcy proceedings necessary. If the judgment and receiving order stand as against him, he will certainly suffer no injustice; while if the receiving order be set aside absolutely and a fresh petition is thus rendered necessary, transactions which might be avoided under the present receiving order in the interests of creditors might become incapable of avoidance under a receiving order of a later date. I see no difficulty in amending the judgment by adding after the words "defendants" the words "other than Gilbert Walter Beauchamp." There is, I think, nothing irregular in a judgment against a firm in the firm's name excluding one of the partners. It may be, in many cases, of advantage to a plaintiff to obtain such a judgment where he fails to establish the liability of a member of a firm, inasmuch as the judgment would bind not only the partners who have appeared but also any dormant partners who have not appeared. This might be a reason for taking the judgment in that form rather than as a judgment against the known members of the firm who were liable for the debt.

D Supposing the judgment thus amended, I think the bankruptcy proceedings may be amended in conformity therewith by adding throughout after the words "Beauchamp Brothers" the words "other than Gilbert Walter Beauchamp." The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, gives ample powers of amendment. By s. 105 (3) [see now s. 109 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) E 420)] the court may at any time

"amend any written process or proceeding under this Act on such terms, if any, as it may think fit to impose."

Instead, therefore, of setting aside the receiving order, I think the proper course will be to amend it in the manner which I have suggested. It will thus constitute F as from its date a valid receiving order against Ralph Beauchamp, and I think the receiver appointed under that order should also be appointed receiver of the partnership assets for the purpose of protecting them for the benefit of the creditors. I think there should be no costs on either side of these proceedings. If any have been paid they should be repaid or allowed in account as against costs due from the other party.

G LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur. It would be most unfortunate if the adult members of a partnership could evade liability because one of the partners was a minor. If this was laid down minors would be found in many partnerships. The powers of amendment referred to by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack enable a court to recognise adequately the position of the minor, without freeing H any adult member of the partnership from any legal liability he may be under.

LORD WATSON and LORD MACNAGHTEN concurred.

GROSVENOR HOTEL CO. v. HAMILTON

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Lopes and Davey, L.J.J.), May 29, 31, June 1, 1894]

Landlord and Tenant—Derogation from grant—Damage to demised premises by working by landlord of engines on adjacent land—Measure of damages.
Nuisance—Vibration—Engines on adjoining land—Damage to premises—Measure of damages.

In an action brought by the plaintiff company as landlords against the defendant, their tenant, for rent due, the defendant counterclaimed for damages on the ground that structural damage had been caused to the demised premises by the vibration of engines worked on adjacent land by the plaintiff company, and that, as a result, the demised premises were condemned as dangerous structures and the defendant was forced to leave and seek other premises. He claimed damages for nuisance, or, in the alternative, for interference in the quiet enjoyment of the premises contrary to the plaintiff company's covenant, as a result of which his business had been damaged.

Held: (i) the plaintiff company could not derogate from its grant of the lease by using the adjoining land so as to interfere with the enjoyment by the defendant of the demised premises, and, therefore, they were liable to the defendant in damages; (ii) the measure of the damages recoverable by the defendant was not confined to the damage flowing from the loss of the lease, but included compensation for whatever was the natural consequence of the wrongful acts of the plaintiff company, such as the expense of taking new premises and the cost of removal.

D Appeal by the plaintiff company and application for the new trial of an action tried before GRANTHAM, J., with a jury, on the ground of misdirection and that the verdict found for the defendant on his counterclaim was unreasonable and the damages awarded excessive.

The action was brought to recover the sum of £62 10s., being one quarter's rent due in respect of certain buildings which had been demised by the plaintiff company to the defendant, Henry Thomas Hamilton, by an indenture dated Mar. 25, 1887, for a term of fourteen years, subject to a proviso enabling the plaintiff company to put an end to the lease at any time upon giving six months' notice to the defendant. The lease contained a covenant by the plaintiff company that the defendant, his executors, administrators, and assigns, duly paying the rent, and performing and observing the covenants thereby reserved and contained, might at all times during the continuance of the term thereby granted quietly enter into, hold, enjoy, receive, and take the rents, issues, and profits of the demised premises without any claim or demand to the contrary by the plaintiff company, their successors or assigns, or any person rightfully claiming by, under, or in trust for them. By his amended statement of defence the defendant denied that he owed the plaintiff company the sum of £62 10s., or any sum. He stated that he was a printer and publisher, and had carried on his business in the buildings held under the lease, and that he and his predecessors in title for more than twenty years before the commencement of this action had been entitled to have and had of right the buildings supported by the land adjacent thereto. He alleged that shortly after he entered under the lease the plaintiff company wrongfully excavated, and in a careless and negligent manner, the land owned by them adjacent to his buildings, and wrongfully removed the land, or part of it, placing on the land engines for boring and working artesian wells for the purpose of supplying a hotel, the property of the plaintiff company, with water, and other engines for working dynamos for supplying the hotel with electric light. He alleged that the engines were placed and worked in a negligent and careless manner, and lessened and damaged the support to his buildings by vibration; that they were thereby deprived of the support to which they were entitled, and cracked, bulged, started, warped, and became dangerous; that upon June 24, 1893, on the application of the London County Council to a metropolitan police magistrate, the buildings were condemned as dangerous structures, and were ordered to be renovated and repaired; and that, consequently, he, with his family and under-tenants, was obliged to leave the buildings, and ceased to carry on his business therein. In the alternative the defendant alleged that he had been interfered with in the quiet enjoyment of the buildings, and been deprived of the use and advantages thereof, contrary to the plaintiff company's covenant, and that his business had thereby been damaged. By his counterclaim the defendant claimed damages, alleging that by reason of the condition of the premises he had been obliged to obtain other buildings wherein to carry on his business, and in so doing had suffered loss of profit while the business was being moved. The plaintiff company, in reply, alleged that the buildings at the time when they were demised to the defendant were old and in an unstable condition, that the engines complained of had been previously erected, and that the defendant knew these facts at the time of taking the lease. It was proved at the trial that the defendant's buildings at the date of the lease were in an unstable condition.

The action was tried before GRANTHAM, J., and a common jury on April 23 and 24, 1894, when his Lordship directed the jury that, if the defendant's buildings were in fact brought down by the vibrations from the plaintiff company's engines, the plaintiff company was liable in damages to the defendant on the counterclaim. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff company on the claim for £62 10s. (the amount of the rent), and a verdict for the defendant on the counterclaim for £308 5s. with costs of the action, and judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff company appealed, and applied for a new trial as to the counterclaim on the ground of misdirection in that the learned judge was wrong in directing the jury that the defendant was entitled to a verdict on the counterclaim if they found that the vibrations from the plaintiff company's engines had injured the defendant's buildings; that the learned judge ought to have directed the jury that the plaintiff company would only be liable if there was such an amount of vibration from the engines as would have affected houses of ordinary stability; and, further, that the verdict found for the defendant on the counterclaim was unreasonable and against the evidence, that the damages were excessive, and some of the damages awarded by the jury were too remote and not recoverable in point of law.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case raises a question of some importance. The action is by the plaintiff company as landlords against the defendant as tenant for a quarter's rent. That is met by a counterclaim to the effect that the plaintiff company has by working certain pumping and dynamo engines in the immediate vicinity of the tenant's house shaken the house down. The vibration caused by working the engines was, it is said, so great that the tenant was obliged to move. He complains that he has been put to expense through what has been done by the plaintiff company.

The first question is this: Is there any cause of action on the counterclaim at all? Counsel for the plaintiff company argued that there was not. He said that the tenant's house was a weak, delicate house, and that in consequence of that the tenant was seeking to impose on his landlords a more extensive burden than an ordinary person would have. He argued that, in order to support the action on the counterclaim, the vibration must have been such as to be a nuisance to a person occupying a reasonably well-built house. As between persons not standing in the relation of landlord and tenant that might be so; but this is a case of landlord and tenant—not a case of strangers, merely neighbours to each other—and that is a different matter. The house at the time it was shaken down was an old house. It was described by one of the witnesses as being a delicate house. It was built on piles in a place which had formerly been a marsh, and was twelve inches out of the perpendicular. This must have been known to the landlords at the time the house was let. The landlords have shaken the house down, and yet it is said that the tenant has no cause of action. In my opinion, the tenant has on the counterclaim a cause of action which arises from the vibration which shook the house down, and in consequence of the relationship of landlord and tenant existing

A between the parties, the landlords are estopped from saying that the house was a weak house. Otherwise we should be allowing the landlords to derogate from their own grant, and that cannot be the law. I agree that the derogation from the grant would not of itself be a cause of action. But the cause of action here is the shaking down of the house. This view gets rid of all difficulty about implying a covenant for quiet enjoyment more extensive than the express covenant contained in the lease. This is a very limited covenant which would not cover this case; and Line v. Stephenson (1) shows that, where a lease contains an express covenant for quiet enjoyment, it excludes any more extensive covenant being implied. The effective cause of action here is nuisance, not the breach of any implied covenant.

C A question was raised as to the amount of damages. It is said that the true measure of damages is the loss of the value of the lease. Unquestionably, if the lease had any value, that would have to be taken into consideration in estimating damages, and the term of the lease would be material. But the damages, in my opinion, are not confined to the damage (if any) which flowed from the loss of the lease. The true principle to be applied is that which is applicable to cases of tort, i.e., that the injured party is entitled to damages for whatever is the natural consequence of the wrongful act. Here it was a natural consequence of the wrongful act of his lessors that the tenant was obliged to take another house, and he is entitled to damages for the expenses of removal. The jury have assessed the damages on a somewhat too liberal scale, and we think that the right course will be to reduce the damages on the counterclaim to a sum of £200, which seems to be what is fairly attributable to the wrongful act of the lessors. As, however, the appeal has in substance failed, the plaintiffs must pay the costs.

E LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The point that we have to consider arises upon the defendant's counterclaim. The defendant says that the plaintiffs have shaken down his house. The lease contains an express covenant for quiet enjoyment of a limited character, and Line v. Stephenson (1) shows that the defendant cannot avail himself of any implied covenant of a more extensive character. Therefore the counterclaim cannot be based upon implied covenant. But the vibration of the plaintiff company's engines has shaken down the defendant's house, and it cannot be denied that what the plaintiff company has done constituted an interference with the comfortable and convenient use and occupation of his house by the defendant. That is a nuisance, and is, therefore, a cause of action. The plaintiffs cannot by way of answer rely on the fact that they were only using their own premises in a reasonable manner. That is no answer: see Bamford v. Turnley (2). But the plaintiffs say that the defendant's house was an old and delicate one, and that if it had been a reasonably stable house there would have been no nuisance. It is unnecessary to say how that might be as between strangers. But the fact that the house was unstable cannot be taken advantage of by the plaintiffs, because they let the house in that state and condition of instability to the defendant. The plaintiffs are, therefore, estopped from setting up the instability of the house as an excuse for what they have done, because that would be derogating from their own grant. As regards the amount of damages I think that the defendant received more than he was entitled to; and I think that £200 is the proper sum.

I DAVEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Notwithstanding the able and ingenious argument of counsel for the plaintiff company, I think that the defendant is entitled to recover on his counterclaim. I agree that the right of action cannot be based on any implied covenant for quiet enjoyment. The right of action, in my opinion, is based on trespass or nuisance; and it depends on the fact that the plaintiffs have derogated from their own grant. It is an absolute rule of law that a grantor cannot derogate from his own grant. He cannot use his adjoining land so as to interfere with the enjoyment of the demised premises. That principle is clearly stated in Caledonian Rail. Co. v. Sprot (3); Elliott v. North Eastern Rail.

Co. (4) and Rigby v. Bennett (5). It is sometimes put as a case of implied obligation, and sometimes as a grant of a quasi-easement—something in the nature of an easement—to place the lessee in the position of not being interfered with by any dealing by the lessor with his adjoining land. That is the way in which SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., put it in Rigby v. Bennett (5). He said this (21 Ch.D. at p. 567):

“If the corporation had granted a lease of land on which a house was to be built, and it was built in a reasonable manner, it appears to me impossible to say that they could afterwards be entitled to let the land down by dealing with the adjacent land belonging to them. If, again, they granted the house to the plaintiff as it then stood, or granted the land on which the house was standing, they granted with it, if I may say so, the easement or the implied obligation or warranty that the house should not be let down by anything done on their adjoining land.”

The rule of law as to that is also treated very elaborately from the same point of view by THESIGER, L.J., in Wheeldon v. Burrows (6). In my opinion, therefore, the tenant is entitled to recover on this counterclaim. I should arrive at the same result if I dealt with the right of the lessee as a grant—in the nature of an easement which he has purchased—of being undisturbed by any dealing by the lessors with their adjoining land. As to the damages, I agree with the view of the other lords justices.

By s. 14 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, where a bill is not payable on demand, the bill is due and payable “on the last day of grace.” Accordingly, the holder of a bill of exchange payment of which is refused by the acceptor on the last day of grace cannot commence an action against the acceptor until the expiration of that day, although he can at once give notice of dishonour to the drawer and the endorser.

C Appeal by the defendant from a decision of CAVE, J., in an action by the plaintiff to recover £75, the amount due to the plaintiff as the holder of a bill of exchange for that amount, dated Oct. 16, 1893, drawn on and accepted by the defendant. The bill was made payable three months after date, and was accepted payable at a specified bank. January 19, 1894, was the third of the days of grace. The bill was presented for payment on the afternoon of that day, and payment was refused. Later on the same day the writ in the action was issued. By his defence the defendant raised inter alia the objection that the action had been commenced prematurely before the expiration of the three days of grace allowed by s. 14 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and it was contended that, the acceptance being what is defined by s. 19 as a "general" one, payment might have been made by the defendant at any time before the expiration of the last day of grace, and that consequently no cause of action against the defendant had arisen when the writ was issued.

"Where a bill is not payable on demand the day on which it falls due is determined as follows: (1) Three days, called days of grace, are, in every case where the bill itself does not otherwise provide, added to the time of payment as fixed by the bill, and the bill is due and payable on the last day of grace."

F By s. 47:

"(1). A bill is dishonoured by non-payment (a) when it is duly presented for payment and payment is refused or cannot be obtained, or (b) when presentment is excused and the bill is overdue and unpaid. (2). Subject to the provisions of this Act, when a bill is dishonoured by non-payment an immediate right of recourse against the drawer and endorsers accrues to the holder."

G CAVE, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff for £27 10s., the amount which he had paid for the bill. The defendant appealed.

E. B. Calvert (Lister Drummond with him) for the defendant.

H R. A. Germaine for the plaintiff.

I LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts, and continued: There is no doubt that, on payment of the bill being refused, the plaintiff had an immediate right of recourse against those secondarily liable, viz., the drawer and endorsers. But the question which we have to consider is whether the plaintiff had then a cause of action against the acceptor—whether the acceptor could be sued on the bill before the expiration of the last of the three days of grace—in other words, whether the acceptor was not entitled to the whole period up to the end of that day in which to pay the bill.

Prima facie, I should have thought it plain that, according to ordinary principles of law, he was so entitled. But we are asked to hold the contrary, partly on the construction of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and partly in deference to the opinion expressed by BULLER, J., in Leftley v. Mills (2) (4 Term Rep. at p. 174).

When we look at the Act, we see that it does not go to that extent. It certainly seems a little paradoxical that a bill of exchange should be treated as dishonoured for one purpose and not for another. But it is clear that, when payment of a bill is refused on its presentation at any time during the day on which it falls due, the holder has an immediate right of recourse against the drawer and the endorsers. He can at once give notice of dishonour to the drawer and the endorsers. But he is not entitled to commence an action against those parties any more than against the acceptor before the expiration of the last day of grace. If we were to hold the contrary, we should really be cutting down the days of grace. It is true that, in Leftley v. Mills (2), BULLER, J., dissented from the view expressed by LORD KENYON, C.J. LORD KENYON thought that, in the case of a bill of exchange, as in the case of other contracts, if a man was bound to pay money within a certain time, "the party bound had till the last moment of the day to deliver himself from the obligation by paying." BULLER, J., said that the acceptor's undertaking was "to pay the bill on demand on any part of the third day of grace," and that the bill was "payable any time within the last day of grace on demand, provided that demand be made within reasonable hours." But the point there before the court was not the right of the holder to bring an action on a dishonoured bill, but his right to protest the bill, or to give notice of dishonour, and, as to that, the view expressed by BULLER, J., was clearly accurate.

The point which we have to decide is not a new one; it was actually decided in Wells v. Giles (1), though that case is not referred to in BYLES ON BILLS. But it is a clear decision that an action on a dishonoured bill cannot be commenced on the third day of grace. The same thing has been decided in America, as is shown by the cases which have been cited to us, and it is not inconsistent with the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Hartley v. Case (3) is rather in favour of this view than against it. The argument addressed to us on behalf of the plaintiff is not, as it appears to me, supported by any English authority; and there is the direct authority of Wells v. Giles (1) to the contrary, which is in accordance with the general understanding of merchants. In my opinion, judgment must be entered for the defendant, with costs. The defence is a technical one, but it was distinctly raised on the pleadings.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 14 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, says that a bill of exchange is "due and payable on the last day of grace," and I read that as meaning that the bill is due and payable at the end of the last day of grace, and that no cause of action by the holder against the acceptor exists until the end of the third day of grace. Presumably, the object is to give the acceptor the opportunity of paying the bill at any time during the three days of grace. If he has not the whole of the third day during which to meet the bill I cannot see how he gets three days of grace. That was evidently the view of BYLES, J., for he says in his work on BILLS (14th Edn.), at p. 278:

"Three days of grace are in every case (unless otherwise provided in the bill or note) added to the time of payment, and the bill or note falls due on the last of these."

And again, at p. 281:

"A presentment for payment before the expiration of the days of grace is premature, and will not enable the holder to charge the antecedent parties."

And again, at p. 299:

"The acceptor has the whole of that day [the day on which the bill falls due] within which to make payment; and, though he should, in the course of that day, refuse payment, which refusal entitles the holder to give notice of dishonour, yet, if he subsequently on the same day makes payment, the payment is good, and the notice of dishonour becomes of no avail."

In my opinion, the true view is that the acceptor is entitled to the full benefit of the three days of grace, and, notwithstanding the able argument which has been

A addressed to us, and the cases which have been cited, I am of opinion that an action cannot be brought against the acceptor until after the expiration of the last of those three days. The appeal ought, therefore, to be allowed, and with costs.

B DAVEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I should add nothing but for the fact that we are differing from the judgment of the court below. But for the very able argument of counsel for the plaintiff, and for the fact that a different view was taken by the learned judge, I, personally, should not have thought the point an arguable one. I should have thought that both under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and under the law merchant, which is part of the common law, when three days of grace are allowed for the payment of a bill of exchange the acceptor has the whole of the last day in which to pay the bill, subject to his doing so within reasonable hours, and that he cannot, for the purpose of an action being brought against him on the bill, be said to have made default in payment until the end of the third day of grace. In other words, no right of action accrues to the holder of the bill against the acceptor until the expiration of the third day of grace.

C Although there is no other express decision on the point, there is Wells v. Giles (1), and the opinion of BYLES, J., to the same effect is clearly expressed in the passage which has been read by LOPES, L.J. We are asked to take a different view by reason of some of the words of the Act and other cases which have been referred to. But those authorities do not seem to me to be in point. They are all directed to the point whether notice of the dishonour of a bill can be given to the drawer and endorsers on the last day of grace, so as to entitle the holder subsequently to recover from them. It is true that in Leftley v. Mills (2), BULLER, J., expressed an opinion different from that of LORD KENYON, C.J.; but the point to which his observations were directed was whether notice of dishonour given on the third day of grace was sufficient to charge an endorser of the bill. The same point arose in Haynes v. Birks (4). There, the question was whether a bill having become due on Saturday, and having been dishonoured, notice of dishonour given to an endorser on the following Tuesday was sufficient to charge him; and in dealing with that question, LORD ALVANLEY, C.J., referred to the opinion expressed by BULLER, J., in Leftley v. Mills (2), and he came to the conclusion that the notice was sufficient to enable the holder to have recourse to the endorser. The case had nothing to do with the accrual of a right of action on the bill. The same point was dealt with in Burbridge v. Manners (5). In Hartley v. Case (3), both the judgments of ABBOTT, C.J. (that at the trial and that in banc), assume, I think, that the acceptor has the whole of the last day of grace in which to pay the bill, although non-payment on presentation of the bill at any time on the last day is such a dishonour as entitles the holder to give notice of dishonour to the drawer and endorsers. Those, I think, were all the cases referred to by counsel for the plaintiff.

H As regards s. 47 of the Act, I do not construe it as counsel for the plaintiff does. It does not say that, on the presentment and dishonour of the bill, an immediate right of action against the drawer and endorsers accrues to the holder, and I do not think that that is the meaning. It would be very anomalous if, in respect of the same bill of exchange, rights of action against different persons were to accrue at different times. In my opinion, s. 47 means only that the holder of the bill I may, immediately on payment being refused by the acceptor, give notice to the drawer and the endorsers, telling them that he shall hold them liable on it. But they, as well as the acceptor, still have the whole of the last day of grace in which to pay the bill, and, if it is not paid before the end of that day, the holder's right of action against them becomes complete. It is for the benefit of the holder that he should be able to give notice of dishonour on the last day of grace, because, by so doing, he obtains a right of action against the drawer and the endorsers earlier than he otherwise would. I agree that the appeal should, under the circumstances, be allowed, with costs, and that judgment should be entered for the defendant.

Injunction—Quia timet action—Nuisance—Need to show strong case of probability of mischief—Temporary small-pox hospital.

A person seeking an injunction to restrain an alleged future nuisance, be it public or private, must show a strong case of probability that the apprehended mischief will arise.

The defendant corporation having proposed to establish a small-pox hospital on land belonging to them which was near a cemetery, the Attorney-General, at the relation of a local authority and private persons, owners of property near the site of the hospital, applied for an injunction to restrain the defendants from establishing the hospital so as to cause a nuisance to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood or to persons frequenting the cemetery.

Held: on the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs they had failed to show that there was a probability, much less a high degree of probability, that the apprehended danger would ensue, and, therefore, the injunction was refused.

D Motion in an action by the Attorney-General, at the relation of the Withington Local Board, and certain owners of property in the district, for an injunction restraining the defendants, Manchester Corporation, until the trial of the action from establishing in the southern cemetery at Withington, near Manchester, any hospital or hospitals for the reception of persons suffering from small-pox, or other infectious diseases, so as to cause a nuisance to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, or to persons frequenting the cemetery.

E The city of Manchester had for some time been suffering from an epidemic of small-pox. The small-pox patients had been accommodated at Monsall Hospital, within the city, but that hospital having become full and overcrowded, the defendants, as the urban sanitary authority, proposed to erect a temporary additional hospital at the west end of the cemetery at Withington, belonging to the defendants, sufficient for the reception of not more than sixty patients.

F Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Farwell, Q.C., and O. L. Clare in support of the motion. Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Byrne, Q.C., and Macmorran for the defendants.

G CHITTY, J.—This is the third motion which has been made against the defendants in respect of the hospital which they propose to open in the district of the Withington Local Board, for the reception of small-pox patients. The present action is brought by the Attorney-General, not ex officio, but at the instance of relators, and also by private persons as plaintiffs; but the case of the private plaintiffs was not argued at the Bar. The foundation of the motion is an apprehended public nuisance, the nuisance being not an actual or existing nuisance, but a future nuisance, which, it is alleged, will arise if the hospital is opened. The action, then, is what is technically known as a quia timet action.

H The question as to the principle on which the court proceeds in granting or refusing an injunction in such actions has been the subject of numerous decisions, among which are Crowder v. Tinkler (1); Earl of Ripon v. Hobart (2); Haines v. Taylor (3); Hepburn v. Lordan (4); A.-G. v. Kingston-on-Thames Corpn. (5); Salvin v. North Brancepeth Coal Co. (6); Fletcher v. Bealey (7). The principle appears to be the same whether the alleged future nuisance is public or private.

I In one of the cases to which I have referred, the alleged nuisance was a public nuisance; in others it was a private nuisance. In some, acts had been done which, it was alleged, would result in future mischief or injury, but had not already resulted in injury or substantial damage; in others, there was mere threat or intention. But in regard to all such cases the principle is the same. Where it is certain that the injury will arise, the court will at once interfere by injunction; as, for instance, in the case of a threat to cut a permanent ditch across a public highway. But the court does not require absolute certainty before it intervenes; something less will suffice: see LORD BROUGHAM's judgment in Earl of Ripon v.

Hobart (2). In Crowder v. Tinkler (1) (the gunpowder case), LORD ELDON, who granted the injunction, spoke (19 Ves. at p. 622) of "extreme probability of irreparable injury." In A.-G. v. Kingston-on-Thames Corpn. (5), WOOD, V.-C., who refused the injunction, considered the question to be whether there was evidence of an actual nuisance committed, or "evidence of the extreme probability of a nuisance if that which was being done was allowed to continue." In Fleet v. Metropolitan Asylums Board, Darenth Small-pox Camp Case (8), where the hospital was in actual operation, the court refused the injunction, COTTON, L.J., in his judgment, laying it down (2 T.L.R. at p. 362) that "the plaintiffs must make out that there was real danger, otherwise, however much they might feel the hospital to be an annoyance, they could not get an injunction."

The principle which I think may be properly and safely extracted from the quia timet authorities is that the plaintiff must show a strong case of probability that the apprehended mischief will, in fact, arise.

Before stating the facts, I will make a few observations in regard to public nuisance at common law. The plaintiffs' case is that the defendants are proposing to do acts which, if done, will constitute a common or public nuisance, and, as such, will constitute an indictable offence. A great variety of instances of the different kinds of public nuisances will be found collected in RUSSELL ON CRIMES (5th Edn.), Vol. 1, p. 418 et seq. and in STEPHEN'S CRIMINAL DIGEST (3rd Edn.), p. 126, including R. v. Vantandillo (9) and R. v. Burnett (10), both small-pox cases, and cited at the Bar in argument before me. Those two cases show that, although no actual mischief had arisen from the acts done, there may be an indictable offence if there is danger to the public health. In R. v. Lister and Biggs (11), the naphtha case, the keeping of large quantities of a highly inflammable fluid near a highway to the danger of the public was held to be an indictable offence, though no fire had taken place. In the Darenth case (8), SIR E. FRY appears to have adopted, as applicable in such cases, COCKBURN, C.J.'s statement of the law, that it must be shown that there is "a well-founded and reasonable apprehension of danger." The apprehended future danger in the present case is danger to the public health.

Undoubtedly, there are many cases of public nuisance—by interference with an unquestionable right of the public, such, for instance, as the permanent obstruction of a highway—where the court did decline at once to permit evidence to be given of any supposed public benefit arising from the wrongful act complained of, and would refuse to balance the good alleged to accrue to some portions of the public against the mischief to the public in general. But in the case where the health of the Queen's subjects in general is concerned, it may possibly be a question whether, if the evidence shows that the maintenance of a small-pox hospital is on the whole, balancing the good against the evil, more beneficial to the health of the public at large, or to that portion of the public that inhabits or frequents the neighbourhood, than the leaving of the persons suffering from the disease scattered in their own homes, some weight might not be properly allowed to this circumstance. If LORD HARDWICKE is rightly reported in the case of Coldbath Fields Small-pox Hospital—Baines v. Baker (12)—he appears to have entertained some such question, when he stated his opinion that the hospital was "a charity like to prove of great advantage to mankind." But, although I throw out these observations as being possibly worthy of future consideration, I state expressly that they do not form any ground of my decision on this motion.

In the present case the plaintiffs' counsel extracted from the affidavits the proposition that a small-pox hospital is a centre from which the disease, somehow or other (it was not for them to say how), spreads to an extent dangerous to public health for the distance of a half-mile radius. It was necessarily admitted that the burden of proof lay on the plaintiffs, but at one time it seemed as if the argument were being put as dividing the evidence into two parts, and as contending that the plaintiffs had made out a prima facie case which shifted on to the defendants a

A burden which they had failed to discharge. But the argument was not so put in the reply, the contention being that there was to be found running through the evidence of the defendants an admission, express or implied, that it was not safe to leave an intervening clear space of less than 200 yards. I am unable to find any such admission; the substance of the defendants' evidence is that this hospital, situate and carried on as it will be, will not give rise to any appreciable danger to public health.

Much reliance was placed by the plaintiff's counsel on the report on the Sheffield small-pox epidemic, 1897-88, which, however, presented essentially different conditions from those in the present case. The hospital was placed on the verge of a poor and densely-populated district; there were grave faults in the administration of the hospital, both within and without, and there was a recklessness displayed by the population which seems almost incredible. Each case depends on its own facts; other cases may afford assistance to the experts, but they are not guides which the court is bound to follow. So far as concerns any former case, whether decided in a court of justice or not, the report on the Fulham smallpox hospital, 1885-6, and the Darenth case (8) appear to be more apposite to the present than the report on the Sheffield epidemic. In the Darenth case (8), the camp hospital contained 1,000 patients, and the clear space left round it was only fifty yards; yet it was held that the plaintiff had not made out real danger; and this decision was arrived at on the trial, and after the witnesses had been cross-examined. The plaintiff's counsel resorted to the argument of convenience and inconvenience and the propriety of maintaining the existing status quo, urging that, if the injunction was refused, irreparable damage might fall on the inhabitants of Withington, whereas if it were granted but little or no harm would be sustained by Manchester. But this argument cannot prevail; the granting of an injunction might result in penning back this scourge on the citizens, and thus inflict on them irreparable injury.

In my opinion, however, the evidence in favour of the plaintiffs' case is not sufficiently cogent to make the question of granting or refusing the injunction turn on the consideration of convenience or inconvenience. I have purposely refrained from dealing with the medical testimony in detail. It is seldom advisable in a case of this sort to submit conflicting evidence to any critical examination on a motion. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the plaintiffs have failed on this motion to make out that there is a probability, much less that there is a high degree of probability, that the apprehended danger will in fact ensue. In parting with the case, I think it right to say that the court ought to exercise great caution before it accepts any general proposition of fact which might tend to the closing of many a well-ordered small-pox hospital in the country. The necessity for caution is all the greater because the doctrine of coming to a nuisance has long since been excluded. I, for the reasons given, refuse the injunction. Costs will be costs in the action.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of WRIGHT, J., at the trial without a jury, in Middlesex.

Mrs. Lloyd entered into a hire-purchase agreement for some furniture with one Hardy, a furniture dealer, and was in possession of the furniture under that agreement. Hardy assigned the agreement and all his interest thereunder to the plaintiff. Before all the payments of rent under the agreement had been made, Mrs. Lloyd sold and delivered the furniture to the defendant. The defendant did not know that Mrs. Lloyd was in possession of the furniture under the agreement, and bought in good faith and without notice of the plaintiff's rights. In an action by the plaintiff for the return of the furniture from the defendant or for damages for conversion, WRIGHT, J., held that the case came within s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, which afforded a good defence to the action.

A The plaintiff appealed.

C. L. Attenborough for the defendant.

B LORD ESHER, M.R. It seems to me that this case is quite clear. The meaning of s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, is plain, and only one construction can be put on it. In one set of sections the Act deals with "Dispositions by mercantile agents," and in another set of sections, including s. 9, with "Dispositions by sellers and buyers of goods." The words of s. 9 are as plain as they can be, and this case is clearly within them. Mrs. Lloyd had agreed to buy the goods by means of a hire-purchase agreement, and the goods were put into her possession by the owner. The goods were sold by Mrs. Lloyd to the defendant, who bought them without notice of the right of the original seller, and in good faith. If the defendant had known that Mrs. Lloyd was in possession under a hire-purchase agreement, in my opinion he would have had sufficient notice of the right of the plaintiff, but he had no such knowledge, and acted in good faith. Section 9 was enacted with reference to this very kind of case, and does apply to this case. The judgment of WRIGHT, J., was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

D BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

E KAY, L.J.—This agreement is clearly an agreement to purchase. It begins by stating that it is an agreement for the hire and purchase of the goods. The next clause provides that the hirer agrees to pay by way of rent for the hire and use of the furniture the total sum of £97 4s., and the last clause provides that the furniture shall become the sole and absolute property of the hirer when that sum has been paid. Then follows a schedule describing all the furniture. That is an agreement to buy the goods; and the case clearly comes within s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889, which was, I suppose, passed to cover this very kind of transaction. The appeal must be dismissed.

Bailee—Liability—Restaurant keeper—Loss of customer's coat.

On the plaintiff's entering the defendant's restaurant to dine, his coat was taken from him by a waiter who hung it up immediately behind the plaintiff. When the plaintiff had finished the meal his coat was missing.

Held: the defendant was liable in negligence and as bailee for the loss of the plaintiff's coat.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Westminster County Court in an action in which the plaintiff claimed from the defendant the value of a coat lost in the circumstances set out in the headnote, or, alternatively, for damages for loss of the coat of which the defendant was bailee. The jury found that there was want of reasonable care on the part of the defendant, and the learned judge held that the coat was bailed by the plaintiff to the defendant.

CHARLES, J.—This appeal must be dismissed. There are two questions which we have to consider: first, whether the defendant was a bailee of the coat; secondly, whether there was on his part any negligence owing to a want of reasonable care. There was, in my opinion, ample evidence of negligence. The first point is more troublesome—whether the facts show a bailment of the coat, or merely that it was taken by the waiter as an act of good nature or service, without any intention of taking charge of it. I think that the jury were justified in finding, on the evidence before them, that the coat was bailed to the defendant. The evidence really came to this, that it was the waiter who relieved the plaintiff of his coat and selected the place where it was put. As I suggested during the argument, there might have been a waiter at the door of the dining-room or in the vestibule to take the coats of guests before they entered the dining-room. If such a person takes a customer's coat, the mere fact of his taking and disposing of it where he chooses would be evidence that the restaurant keeper was a bailee of the coat, for such a system might obviously add to the popularity of the restaurant, and would

A probably be adopted with that very object in view. In my opinion, there is only a difference in degree between the case of the restaurant keeper providing a servant to take his customers' coats in that way and the present case.

B WRIGHT, J.—I agree with my learned brother that, if there was a bailment, there was sufficient evidence of negligence. The point as to the question of bailment not having, it appears, been clearly raised at the trial in the court below, in my opinion, according to Smith v. Baker & Sons (1), there is no need for us to decide it. For the purpose of this decision I must assume that there was a bailment.

Motion for judgment or a new trial by the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff upon a bill of costs.

The defendant had orally retained the plaintiff to act as his solicitor in three actions in the Queen's Bench Division and the plaintiff had accepted the retainer. Before any of the actions had been concluded the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant that he would not act for him any longer, and he then brought this action for costs incurred in the actions up to the date when he had given notice to the defendant. The defendant counterclaimed for negligence and for damages for breach of contract. At the trial of the action before GRANTHAM, J., sitting with a jury, the defendant began and was examined in chief. The learned judge stopped the cross-examination of the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff was entitled to determine his retainer whenever he liked, subject to giving his client a notice reasonable in point of time, and then to sue for his bill of costs. As the defendant admitted that the plaintiff's notice was reasonable in point of time, he refused to receive any evidence as to the grounds on which the plaintiff had given the notice. Upon the question of negligence the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., and Jelf, Q.C. (Bankes with them), for the defendant.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Tindal Atkinson (Winch, Q.C., with them) for the plaintiff.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I confess that I cannot agree with the law as laid down by GRANTHAM, J. When the matter is considered, it seems clear that the contract which we have to deal with here is what is called an entire contract. When a client employs a solicitor in a lawsuit, he does not employ him to take merely one step in the action and to wait for fresh instructions before taking another, and so on. The solicitor is employed to act on behalf of the client in the suit. A solicitor is a skilled person, and it would be of no use to employ him except for the purpose of taking all the steps necessary to bring the suit to an end. If that is the nature of his employment, his contract is an entire one to carry on the action to its conclusion.

It was the view taken by judges in former days that in the case of an ordinary retainer of a solicitor in a lawsuit without any specific terms, the implication of law was that the contract was to carry on the litigation to its conclusion. That is what was held by LORD ELDON, and was acted on by him when he was Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. In Cresswell v. Byron (1), he used these words (14 Ves. at p. 273):

"The Court of Common Pleas, when I was there, held that an attorney, having quitted his client before trial, could not bring an action for his bill."

Those words are exactly in point in the present case. It is true that it might be argued that LORD ELDON's words mean that under no possible circumstances

A could a solicitor bring an action successfully for work done and disbursements made before quitting his client. If that be the meaning of LORD ELDON's words, I may say that the law has since been modified, but the engrafting of a modification upon a rule is not the same thing as setting the rule aside.

B I will not go through all the cases that have been cited. It seems to me that the effect of them is that ever since LORD ELDON's time a retainer of a solicitor in a common law suit has always been held to be one entire contract, so that, unless some recognised exception to the rule arises, the solicitor cannot sue for his bill of costs until his obligation under the contract has been entirely fulfilled. One of those recognised exceptions, if they can rightly be called exceptions, is that a solicitor cannot reasonably be asked to pay out of his own pocket disbursements which he may possibly never recover. Therefore, if he asks his client to provide money for immediate disbursements, and the client refuses to do so, the solicitor is entitled to refuse to act further for the client in the litigation. C In addition to this, lest the solicitor, by throwing up his retainer suddenly at a critical moment should ruin his client, it has been decided that the client is entitled to have reasonable notice of the solicitor's intention not to act any more for him.

D It is not denied that that was the law up to the time of the decision in Van-sandau v. Browne (2). In that case the judges seem to me to have decided no more than that before suing on his bill a solicitor must give his client reasonable notice that he intends not to act for him any longer. Harris v. Osbourn (3) seems to me a much more satisfactory case. LORD LYNTHURST, C.B., there says (2 Cr. & M. at p. 682):

E "I consider that when an attorney is retained to prosecute or defend a cause, he enters into a special contract to carry it on to its termination."

In that sentence the words "special contract" mean "implied contract," and they are used by way of antithesis to a general contract under which the solicitor might sue as upon a quantum meruit for each step in the action which he might F from time to time take on behalf of his client. LORD LYNTHURST goes on (ibid.):

"I do not mean to say that under no circumstances can he put an end to this contract."

G LORD LYNTHURST there recognises the fact that there are certain circumstances under which a solicitor can justify his putting an end to his retainer. He goes on (ibid.): "but it cannot be put an end to without notice." He seems to me to mean by that that, unless a valid notice is given to the client, the solicitor cannot treat his contract of retainer as at an end and sue upon his bill.

The next argument was that the earlier cases must be treated as overruled since a decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Hall and Barker (4). If that decision were inconsistent with the earlier decisions I think it ought to be overruled, but H I do not think that it is inconsistent. The effect of SIR GEORGE JESSEL's judgment is that whatever meaning may be implied at common law in a contract by which a solicitor is retained in a common law action, it would be wrong in the case of a Chancery suit to imply an agreement by the solicitor to carry on the suit to its termination before he is entitled to payment, because Chancery suits are often of a very complicated nature, and sometimes last for years. It would be unjust, I he says, in a suit lasting for many years, to forbid the solicitor from enforcing payment for the work he has done until the completion of the suit, and therefore such an agreement is not to be implied. It may be that in the case of a retainer in a Chancery suit there is an implication that the solicitor shall continue the litigation to the end, but SIR GEORGE JESSEL declined to imply any agreement that the solicitor should not be entitled to payment of his bill until the suit is finished. But with that decision we have nothing to do in the case which is before us. We have only to deal with an ordinary common law action.

The plaintiff was employed as solicitor in three such actions, none of which is finished. He maintains that he is entitled by simply giving notice to his client, reasonable as to time, to put an end to his retainer at his own will and pleasure, without giving any other excuse, and then immediately to bring an action to recover the costs already incurred. I can find no authority which would justify us in holding that to be the law. Every authority which has been cited to us seems to me to be opposed to that contention. I, therefore, think that GRANTHAM, J., was wrong in his ruling, and that the trial ought to have gone on in order to find out whether the solicitor had any reasonable ground for refusing to carry on the three actions to their termination. What are reasonable grounds for such a refusal I am not at present able to say. I doubt whether anything which may happen to the solicitor without any fault on the part of his client would be a sufficient ground for his suing for his costs before he has completed the litigation as he had agreed to do. It was suggested that if any great misfortune happened to him, such as a severe illness, which prevented him from giving personal attention to the litigation, it would not only put an end to his retainer, but would also enable him to sue for his bill of costs for work done up to that time. I do not know that it is necessary to decide that point on the present occasion, but I am strongly of opinion that such a misfortune to the solicitor would not put an end to his contract, and he would not be entitled to sue for the work he had done or the disbursements he had made. Such misfortunes happen in the case of other entire contracts. Take for instance the case of a captain who has agreed to navigate a ship from Liverpool to the Cape upon the terms that he is to be paid a certain sum at the end of the voyage. Would his death in the middle of the voyage enable his executors to sue for the work he had done, and alter the contract from one by which he had agreed to do a certain thing for a certain sum into one by which he was to be paid week by week a reasonable sum for what he had done? I think that, if any such misfortune happened to the solicitor which prevented him from carrying on the litigation, it might, perhaps, be a ground which would protect him if an action was brought against him, but I do not think that it is a ground for saying that his retainer was changed into an agreement to pay for his services on a quantum meruit so as to entitle him to sue for his costs before he has completed that which he contracted to complete. The obligation of the client is to pay his solicitor at the end of the action, unless he does something which justifies the solicitor in putting an end to the retainer and suing for a quantum meruit. I am of opinion that the judgment of GRANTHAM, J., cannot be supported, and we must, therefore, order a new trial.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case is whether or not the plaintiff, who is a solicitor, and brings this action upon a bill of costs, is entitled to maintain the action. I wish to confine my observations to the facts of this case which apply solely to a retainer in an action at common law, because I look upon this retainer in the same light as if there had been a separate retainer in these three actions.

If there is one thing clearer than another from the authorities which have been cited to us since 1801, LORD ELDON's time, down to the present day, it is that the contract of a solicitor with his client upon a retainer like this is an entire contract, and it is his duty to go on with the action until the litigation is finished. I find that laid down hard and fast in LORD ELDON's time, and, subject to some conditions which appear to have crept in, it will be found to have been laid down in Vansandau v. Browne (2), and by LORD LYNDHURST in Harris v. Osbourn (3), where he says (2 Cr. & M. at p. 632):

"I consider that when an attorney is retained to prosecute or defend a cause he enters into a special contract to carry it on to its determination."

I find it laid down in Whitehead v. Lord (5) by PARKE, B., where he says (7 Exch. at p. 694):

A "The rule as applicable to this case was correctly laid down in Harris v. Osbourn (3) that an attorney, under a retainer to conduct a suit, undertakes to conduct the suit to its final determination, and he cannot sue for his bill until that time has arrived."

B I find that not dissented from by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Hall and Barker (4) as applicable to common law actions. He referred to Harris v. Osbourn (3), where it was held that as a general rule an attorney or solicitor retained to conduct a suit was under an obligation to conduct it to its termination, and that he could not sue for his bill of costs until that period had arrived. That was the old principle at common law. The Master of the Rolls did not adopt that principle of common law in the suit which was then before him, but he enunciated that as the principle of common law which has been traced out before us by the learned counsel in the cases which have been produced today. But the authorities go a bit further in my judgment, because in Re Romer and Haslam (6) BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ., enunciate the same proposition.

C Therefore, the prima facie obligation which a solicitor undertakes when he accepts a retainer from a client in a common law action is this. He has entered into an entire contract to carry on the litigation for the client to the end, and until he has carried on that litigation to the end he cannot sue his client for costs. That is the prima facie obligation which he undertakes; but, on the other hand, it seems to me upon the cases that a solicitor may be put into a position by a client in which he may withdraw from the retainer. The point which we have to decide in this case is whether a solicitor can for no reason whatever, in the middle of a common law action, throw up the retainer provided that he gives his client due notice that he is going to do so, and then sue the client for the bill of costs which has been incurred up to that date. That is the point of law which we have to decide. It seems to me to be the result of Vansandau v. Browne (2) and the later cases that have been cited that a client may put his solicitor into such a position that the solicitor becomes entitled to treat the retainer as at an end. For instance, if the client refuses to furnish his solicitor with funds, the solicitor is not bound by his retainer to finish at his own costs the litigation which he has begun for the client. Again, if the client insists upon his solicitor doing something which the solicitor knows to be dishonourable or disgraceful, then I think, speaking for myself, that the solicitor would be justified in refusing to act any longer. There may be other cases in which a client may put his solicitor into such a position that it would be only right that the solicitor should have an option of refusing to act any longer under the retainer. Under those circumstances, as it appears to me, the solicitor would be entitled to sue for his costs out of pocket and his costs up to that date.

F But that is not the case which we have to decide now. The sole point of law here is whether a solicitor without rhyme or reason can throw up his retainer, having given the client due notice that he is going to throw it up, and then sue him for the costs incurred up to that date. The only difficulty I have had about this case is this. I have no difficulty about the judgment of PARKE, B., in Harris v. Osbourn (3). The difficulty which did arise in my mind, but I think it is explainable, is in Whitehead v. Lord (5), where PARKE, B., explains, as I understand, what he meant in Harris v. Osbourn (3). The result of all the cases which have been cited since Vansandau v. Browne (2) in 1832 may be summed-up thus, that at any rate a solicitor cannot get rid of a retainer without giving due notice to a client. I believe that to be the real decision in all these cases. The decision in most of them turned upon the Statute of Limitations. A solicitor having sent in a bill for costs, part of which had been incurred more than six years before the suit, and the client having set up the Statute of Limitations, the question was, whether or not the retainer which the plaintiff had accepted from the client had ever been put an end to. What the learned judges said in those cases was that, inasmuch as no notice was given by the solicitor to the client, the retainer was a continuing one—it was an entire contract and, therefore, the Statute of Limitations had not begun to run. That seems to me to be perfectly consistent with LORD LYNDHURST's judgment in Harris v. Osbourn (3) where he says (2 Cr. & M. at p. 632):

"I do not mean to say that under no circumstances can he [that is, the solicitor] put an end to this contract; but it cannot be put an end to without notice."

PARKE, B., in effect says the same thing. It seems to me that that is the correct interpretation of that judgment. The learned counsel for the plaintiff were quite right to rely upon what was said by PARKE, B., in Whitehead v. Lord (5), when he said (7 Exch. at p. 694):

"The rule as applicable to this case was correctly laid down in Harris v. Osbourn (3), that an attorney under a retainer to conduct a suit undertakes to conduct the suit to its final determination, and he cannot sue for his bill until that time has arrived, subject, however, to the exception there stated, and subject also to the additional exception which arises upon the death of the client, in which case he can sue the personal representatives."

The learned baron did not have his mind directed to the point which we have now before us, namely, whether, upon giving due notice, a solicitor, as I said before, may, without rhyme or reason, throw up his retainer.

In my judgment, the authorities are too strong against the plaintiff's contention. The law is that in a common law action he cannot do so. My brother GRANTHAM stopped the case in limine, and I, therefore, agree that it must go down for a new trial.

DAYEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I only desire to say that I express no opinion, since it is unnecessary to do so, as to what might be the effect of a solicitor's death or permanent incapacity upon a contract to conduct his client's case.

Summons taken out by the plaintiff, Nicholas Sadler, the holder of a first series of debentures of Idlesleigh Mansions, Ltd., asking that an account might be taken of what was due to him for principal, interest, and costs on his debentures, and that the debentures might be enforced by foreclosure or sale, and for possession and a receiver and manager. The defendants were the holders of a second series of debentures of the same company which was also joined as a defendant.

The first series of debentures were dated Nov. 23, 1891, and were of £500 each carrying interest at 6 per cent. By the debentures the company agreed to pay on Nov. 9, 1896, to the registered holder for the time being thereof the sum of £500 with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. quarterly. The company thereby charged with such payments all its property, funds, assets and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being, subject to an existing mortgage of £12,000 or any mortgage or mortgages created in substitution thereof. The debentures were issued subject to the conditions endorsed thereon. Condition 1 provided:

"This debenture is one of a series of debentures each for securing the principal sum of £500 issued, or about to be issued, by the company. The debentures of this issue are to rank pari passu, subject as within mentioned, as a charge on the property hereby charged, and so that such charge shall be a floating security."

By condition 4:

"The principal money hereby secured shall immediately become payable if (a) the company makes default for a period of one calendar month in the payment of any interest hereby secured, and the registered holder hereof before such interest is paid by notice in writing to the company calls in such principal money, or (b) an order is made or an effective resolution is passed for the winding-up of the company."

Interest was paid to the plaintiff until Feb. 9, 1893, but then ceased. On Nov. 8, 1893, at an extraordinary general meeting of the company a resolution was passed to wind up the company voluntarily and a liquidator was appointed. The company's property was subject to a mortgage to secure £12,000 and interest dated Nov. 23, 1891.

March 14, 1894. KEKEWICH, J., read the following judgment. The plurality of debentures may in some cases be a matter of importance, as where one debenture holder purports to sue on behalf of all, or other debenture holders are before the court but do not support the plaintiff; but in this case it is a matter of absolute indifference. All the debentures of the first series are held by the plaintiff, and his position is the same as if a single debenture had been issued to him. Again, these are the debentures of a company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, and I am not troubled with the authority of Blaker v. Herts. and Essex Waterworks Co. (1), or the principle laid down in Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Rail. Co. (2), on which that authority proceeded.

The plaintiff's debentures are in a form now familiar, that of a floating charge, and the amount thereby secured is expressed to be charged by the company,

"on all its property, funds, assets, and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being, subject to the mortgage for £12,000 now existing, or any mortgage or mortgages created in substitution thereof."

The floating character of the charge ceased according to condition 4 endorsed on the debenture on Dec. 8, 1893, when an extraordinary resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company. On that day the subject of the charge, which until then had been necessarily uncertain was ascertained, and from that time the debentures have been a charge on all the property then existing of the company. I am told that this includes leasehold property, which is the most valuable asset, but, apparently, there are some other items, and I am not at liberty to consider the case on the hypothesis, which would remove many difficulties, of the leaseholds being the only property available. Can the remedy by foreclosure be properly applied, not only to them, but also to such other items as exist, including in particular the uncalled capital? That is the question for my decision.

A What is foreclosure? The answer shall be given in the words of SIR GEORGE JESSEL in Carter v. Wake (3) (4 Ch.D. at p. 606):

"The principle on which the court acts . . . is that in a regular legal mortgage there has been an actual conveyance of the legal ownership, and then the court has interfered to prevent that from having its full effect, and when the ground of interference is gone by non-payment of the debt the court simply removes the stop it has itself put on."

B That is in strictness applicable only to a legal mortgage in the full sense of the term; that is to say, it is not in strictness applicable even to an equitable mortgage such as a puisne mortgage necessarily is, though expressed in legal form, and it is still less applicable to a mortgage by way of charge. Nevertheless, the court has got over the difficulty where the charge has been made by deposit of title deeds, and notwithstanding the absence of an accompanying memorandum with or without an agreement to execute a legal mortgage. In these cases, using again the words of SIR GEORGE JESSEL in Carter v. Wake (3) (ibid.)

C "The court treats the deposit of title deeds as an agreement to execute a legal mortgage, and therefore as carrying with it all the remedies incident to such a mortgage."

D It is sometimes stated that the remedy of an equitable mortgagee is foreclosure rather than sale, but no distinct authority to this effect was cited to me, and I have found none. There are many authorities that the remedy of an equitable mortgagee by deposit of title deeds is foreclosure: see for instance James v. James (4); but they do not extend beyond that particular class. There are, however, cases in which equitable mortgagees of property, other than land, have been held entitled to foreclosure. In one case cited in this connection (General Credit and Discount Co. v. Glegg (5)) BACON, V.-C., granted the remedy to lenders on the security of railway shares and debenture stock, but it appears from the report that such shares and stock had been transferred into their names, with power of sale, and, therefore, the authority is scarcely apposite. There are, however, more pointed instances to be found in SETON ON DECREES (5th Edn.), vol. 2. In these cases the judgment of foreclosure has been perfected by direction not always actually given, but necessarily consequent, that the mortgagor do make over the mortgaged property to the mortgagee, so as to complete his irredeemable title by legal ownership. One of these (p. 1661) deals with a mortgage of a pension, which was apparently assigned to the mortgagees, but in such a form that an irrevocable power of attorney to enable them to receive it was required in event of foreclosure, so that something was necessary to complete the legal title, and the mortgage was in substance equitable. Another (p. 1659) deals with consols in court, and the notes (pp. 1662 et seq.) mention further cases on the same lines. In an earlier note (p. 1583) it is stated, and I believe with accuracy, that the remedy of a judgment creditor has been, after some conflict of authority, settled to be foreclosure, and not sale.

H Is there any good reason why these authorities should not be extended, as apparently they never yet have been, to such a charge as is now under consideration? If there be any adverse principle of law or rule of practice, the question must be answered in the negative, but otherwise it is well to remember that foreclosure is not likely to be asked, and is still less likely to be asked successfully, except where the security is deficient, and that in that class of cases the remedy is peculiarly appropriate, and has a value for the mortgagee which can attach to none other. Of course I accept the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL in Carter v. Wake (3), that foreclosure is not applicable to a pledge of chattels. Perhaps that rule may be found to be inconsistent with some decrees of the court, but without pursuing that inquiry, suffice it to say that there is no pledge here. Tennant v. Trenchard (6) was cited, but the judgment in that case seems to me to proceed entirely on the special character of the contract, which made it improper for the trustee to destroy the trust property. But these are the assets of the company, and some of them cannot be realised except by the exercise of powers which are vested by statute and articles of association in the company itself as represented by directors or liquidator. To take the most extreme and most embarrassing item, how can there be foreclosure of uncalled capital? It cannot be vested in the mortgagee, and the extreme limit of his right must be to have the power of calling on the directors or liquidator to exercise their power on his behalf. This sounds somewhat anomalous. But it must be remembered that a mortgage of uncalled capital can be effectually made, and the decisions sanctioning that would be idle if they did not also sanction the realisation of the mortgaged security. If it be urged that such realisation must be by sale, the answer is that a sale is open to the same objection. Supposing the uncalled capital to be sold and assigned to a purchaser, how is he in any better position than the mortgagee; or rather, why should he be entitled to means of enjoying his property to which the mortgagee is not? A

I am reluctant to make an order, the like of which has never been made before. On the other hand, I ought not to hesitate to apply a principle to facts, to which it seems to me to be properly applicable, merely because it has never yet been so applied. I fail to see why an agreement to execute an assignment on default of payment of the money lent should be implied on a deposit of title deeds or certificates of shares (which I think has been done, though I have not been able to put my hand on the case) and not to other property capable as between borrower and lender, and according to the reasonable experience of mankind, of being made the subject of similar contracts. There is this further to be considered. Even if this debenture does not give, one might easily be framed so as to give, a right of foreclosure as regards the leasehold property comprised in it, and it would be difficult, I think, to recognise the right of foreclosure as regards part, and to deny it as regards other part of the property comprised in the same debenture. I will not pursue this thought further now, but, if ever it has to be pursued, the doctrine of the court as regards opening foreclosure must be borne in mind. D

On the whole, I am of opinion that there should be an order declaring the plaintiff entitled to foreclosure, and directing the company at the plaintiff's request to assign to him the several items of property comprised in the debentures. This will require some little consideration in detail. The order must follow as far as possible the usual form, and provide for redemption by any parties entitled to redeem. Counsel for holders of debentures of the second series, intimated that, though not now prepared to apply for a sale, he might wish to do so at a later stage. This, it seems, he can do without special reservation of liberty to apply for that purpose, which therefore I do not propose to insert, but he must take warning that his application can only be granted if at all upon fair terms to the plaintiff on the principle of Woolley v. Colman (7). F

A woman who lived alone with her sick and helpless aunt failed to provide her with food, or sufficient food, and medical attendance, and this neglect accelerated the aunt's death.

Held: the moral obligation to assist a sick and helpless person imposed a legal duty not to withhold such assistance, and the prisoner was properly convicted of manslaughter.

Case Stated for the opinion of the court by DAY, J.

F

The prisoner, who was unmarried and had no means of her own, was indicted for feloniously killing her aunt, Ann Hunt, a woman of seventy-three years of age, with whom she lived and by whom she was maintained. Until a few weeks before her death the deceased was healthy and able to take care of herself. No one lived in the house with or attended to the deceased but the prisoner. Shortly before her death the deceased suffered from gangrene in the leg which rendered her, during the last ten days of her life, unable to attend to herself or to move about, or to do anything to procure assistance. No one but the prisoner had previously to the death of the deceased any knowledge of her condition. The prisoner continued to live in the house at the cost of the deceased, and took in the food supplied by the tradespeople. She did not give nor procure any medical or nursing attendance to or for the deceased, nor did she give notice to any neighbour of her condition or wants, although she had abundant opportunity and occasion to do so. On Aug. 2, while the prisoner was still living in the house, the body of the deceased was found much decomposed, partially dressed in her day clothes, and lying partly on the ground and partly prone upon the bed. The cause of death was exhaustion caused by the gangrene, but substantially accelerated by neglect, want of food, of nursing, and of medical attendance during several days previously to the death. All these wants could and would have been supplied if any notice of the condition of the deceased had been given by the prisoner to any of the neighbours, of whom there were several living in adjoining houses, or to the relations of the deceased, who lived within a few miles.

The learned judge left it to the jury to say, having regard to the circumstances under which the prisoner lived with the deceased, and continued to occupy the house and to take the food provided at the expense of the deceased while the deceased was, as she knew, unable to procure necessities for herself, whether the prisoner did or did not impliedly undertake with the deceased either to wait upon and attend to her herself or to communicate to persons outside the house the knowledge of her helpless condition, and directed the jury that, if they came to the conclusion that the prisoner did so undertake, and that the death of the deceased was substantially accelerated by her failure to carry out such undertaking, they might find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, but that otherwise they should acquit her. The jury found the prisoner guilty. A

The Crown was not represented.

Feb. 4, 1893. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., read the following judgment of the court: It is not correct to say that every moral obligation is a legal duty, but every legal duty is founded upon a moral obligation. In this case, as in most cases, the legal duty can be nothing else than the taking upon oneself the performance of the moral obligation. There is no question whatever that it was this woman's clear duty to impart to the deceased so much of that food, which was taken into the house for both, and paid for by the deceased, as was necessary to sustain her life. The deceased could not get it for herself; she could only get it through the prisoner. It was the prisoner's clear duty at common law to supply it to the deceased, and that duty she did not perform. Nor is there any question that the prisoner's failure to discharge her legal duty, if it did not directly cause, at any rate accelerated, the death of the deceased. There is no case directly on the point, but it would have been a slur and a stigma upon our law if there could be any doubt as to the law to be derived from the principle of decided cases, if cases were necessary. There was a clear moral obligation, and a legal duty founded upon it; a duty wilfully disregarded, and the death was at least accelerated, if not caused, by the non-performance of the legal duty. I am therefore of opinion, and I express the opinion of all my brethren, that the evidence confirmed all that it was necessary to show, and that the conviction was proper and must be upheld. C

Criminal Law—Carnal knowledge—Girl between thirteen and sixteen years—Aiding, abetting, soliciting, and inciting—Liability to conviction—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict., c. 69), s. 5 (1).

A girl under the age of sixteen cannot be convicted of aiding and abetting the commission upon herself of the offence of unlawful carnal knowledge, nor can she be convicted of soliciting and inciting the commission of such an offence upon her.

Notes. The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, was repealed by the Sexual Offences Act, 1956, s. 51, Sched. 4. Section 6 of the 1956 Act re-enacts s. 5 of the 1885 Act in substantially the same form for the purposes of this case. R. v. Higgins (1801), 2 East, 5; 102 E.R. 269; 14 Digest (Repl.) 119, 822.

Case Stated by Robert Malcolm Kerr, Esq., one of the Commissioners of the Central Criminal Court, for the consideration of the court.

On Sept. 15, 1893, Jane Tyrrell was arraigned before the Central Criminal Court, and pleaded Not Guilty to an indictment containing counts charging (i) that being a girl above the age of thirteen years and under the age of sixteen years she aided and abetted the commission upon herself of the offence of carnal knowledge, contrary to s. 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885; and (ii) that she solicited and incited the commission of such offence upon her. The evidence for the prosecution proved that the defendant, who was under the age of sixteen, aided and abetted and solicited and incited Thomas Froud to have unlawful carnal connection with her, for which offence the defendant was convicted. Counsel for the defence, in arrest of judgment, submitted that the indictment disclosed no offence in law. This objection was overruled, but at the request of the defendant's counsel, the following question was reserved for the opinion of the court: Whether it was an offence for a girl between thirteen years and sixteen years of age, to aid and abet a male person in the commission of the misdemeanour of having unlawful carnal connection with her, or to solicit and incite a male person to commit that misdemeanour.

By s. 5 (1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885:

"Any person who unlawfully and carnally knows, or attempts to have unlawful carnal knowledge of any girl being of or above the age of thirteen years, and under the age of sixteen years . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanour . . ."

Clarke Hall (with him Campbell) for the defendant.

Dutton for the Crown.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I believe that I am expressing the opinion of my learned brothers when I say that this conviction must be quashed. What was intended by the legislature in passing the Act of 1885 was to protect girls against themselves, and it cannot be said that an Act which says nothing at all about the girl inciting or anything of that kind, and the whole object of which is to protect women against men, is to be construed so as to render a girl against whom an offence is committed equally liable with the man by whom the offence is committed. In my opinion this conviction cannot be sustained, and must therefore be quashed.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. I fail to see how this argument on the construction of the statute can be supported. The consequences of upholding this conviction would, as has been pointed out in the course of the argument, be most serious, there being scarcely a section in the Act which would not, upon the construction sought to be put upon the Act, support a criminal prosecution against a girl. There is no trace anywhere in the Act of any intention on the part of the legislature to deal with the woman as a criminal, and I am of opinion that the Act does not create the offence alleged in the indictment.

GRANTHAM, LAWRENCE and HENN COLLINS, JJ., concurred.

D Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of HAWKINS, J., at the trial without a jury in Middlesex, dismissing an action by which he claimed to recover the sum of £70 for two quarters' rent of rooms on the first and third floors of No. 62, Strand, London, payable in advance, on Feb. 14 and May 14, 1892.

By an agreement in writing dated Feb. 16, 1891, between the plaintiff, of the one part, and the defendant and six other persons, directors of the National Press Association, Ltd., of the other part, it was agreed that the plaintiff should let the premises for one year commencing from Feb. 1, 1891, at a rent of £140 a year, payable quarterly in advance on Feb. 14, May 14, Aug. 14, and Nov. 14. This agreement was made also as a separate and personal agreement by each of the directors as tenants. All the rent due for the one year ending on Feb. 1, 1892, was paid. The tenants continued in possession of the premises after Feb. 1, 1892, until some time after May 14, and on Feb. 25, 1892, the plaintiff wrote to them as follows:

"Will you kindly send me a cheque for £35 for the quarter's rent due on the 14th."

To this letter no answer was given. On Mar. 24 the agent of the tenants wrote a letter to the plaintiff as follows:

"I am instructed by Mr. McCarthy (and the six other persons) to inform you that it is their intention to discontinue their present tenancy of the offices at 62, Strand, London, at present occupied by them for the purposes of this company, and I am directed to give you notice that they will not continue the same beyond the period required under their agreement. I shall of course be glad if you can see your way to take up the premises on May 14, or even earlier. We shall of course give you every facility for the securing of a new tenant, and I am sure you will meet us in the same spirit."

The plaintiff's solicitors replied that the tenants were yearly tenants, and must determine their tenancy by notice to quit. After May 14, 1892, the plaintiff demanded payment of two quarters rent, and brought this action against Mr. McCarthy alone.

At the trial before HAWKINS, J., without a jury, the learned judge held that there was no yearly tenancy after Feb. 14, 1892, but only a tenancy at will. He offered to allow the plaintiff to amend by making a claim for use and occupation upon terms, but the plaintiff refused to amend, and the learned judge gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

J. E. Bankes for the plaintiff.
McCarthy for the defendant.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I cannot agree with the decision of HAWKINS, J., in this case. There is no real dispute as to the facts. The defendant McCarthy and some others became tenants to the plaintiff upon agreed terms for the term of one year, which was to expire on Feb. 1, 1892. The agreement for the tenancy contained terms as to the amount of, and the payment of, rent. This tenancy expired by effluxion of time, no notice to quit being necessary, on Feb. 1, 1892. The tenants did not then go out of possession; they remained in possession from Feb. 1, when the lease expired, for a considerable time afterwards. It is evident that the plaintiff consented to their remaining in possession as tenants: he treated them as tenants, and took the view that they were remaining in possession as tenants upon the terms of the old agreement, that is to say, as tenants for another year and from year to year upon the old terms. He demanded rent from them upon that footing. Up to Mar. 24 the tenants remained in possession and said nothing at all. Upon that day the letter was written upon which the defendant relies.

In my opinion, the doctrine laid down by LORD MANSFIELD in Right d. Flower v. Darby and Bristow (1) is correct. He says (1 Term Rep. at p. 162):

In this case there was the consent of the landlord; the tenant remained in possession, and the landlord consented to his remaining in possession. It was a question for the jury, therefore, whether both parties consented that the tenant should continue in possession after the expiration of the year. The mere fact of remaining in possession must be left to the jury as evidence, though the jury ought to come to the conclusion that there has been consent to remain as tenant. If the tenant makes a statement which is inconsistent with a consent by him to remain as tenant, then he does not agree to remain as tenant; or, if he expressly says that he will not continue to remain in possession as tenant, and tells his landlord to turn him out as best he can, then he does not agree to remain as tenant. If the tenant makes some other stipulation which is not consistent with the inference that he is remaining in possession as tenant upon the old terms, whether that will justify the jury in finding that such inference is done away with, I do not now determine. If, however, the jury find, in the words of LORD MANSFIELD, that by consent of both parties the tenant continues in possession, then the law implies a tacit renovation of the contract; that is, that a new tenancy from year to year has been created upon the old terms. In Right d. Flower v. Darby (1), BULLER, J., says (1 Term Rep. at p. 163):

"The reason of it is, that the agreement is a letting for a year at an annual rent; then, if the parties consent to go on after that time, it is a letting from year to year."

If, therefore, there is the consent of both parties that a man shall continue in possession as tenant, and there is nothing to rebut the inference of law, then by inference of law there is a tenancy from year to year upon the old terms.

Is there in this case a consent to hold over and remain in possession as tenant? From the mere fact of holding over, the jury should infer that the tenant intended to remain in possession as tenant, and not as a mere trespasser. The tenant, however, goes further than that, for in the letter of Mar. 24 he says that he intends to "discontinue their present tenancy of the offices at present occupied by them." The tenancy for the first year was at an end, and, therefore, he must have been tenant in the succeeding year, when speaking of his "present tenancy." That tenancy in the succeeding year was a tenancy from year to year to be determined by the proper notice to quit, and by that letter such notice was given. The letter does not allege any right to give up possession on May 14, but asks to do so as a

A favour. That letter is not consistent with a tenancy at will, and clearly admits that there was a tenancy. I am of opinion that the proper inference from the facts is that the tenant consented to remain in possession as tenant, and did not attempt to impose any terms inconsistent with the old terms, and that he, therefore, became tenant from year to year on the terms of the old agreement so far as they were not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year. I think that the agreement to pay the rent in advance was not inconsistent with a yearly tenancy, and that it therefore became a term of the new tenancy. The plaintiff is consequently entitled to recover the two quarters' rent in advance, and the judgment of HAWKINS, J., cannot be upheld. The appeal must be allowed with costs.

D I will take the case of a tenant holding over after the expiration of one year's tenancy where nothing is said either by the landlord or the tenant. In such a case the proper direction to a jury is this: there has been a holding over and nothing said as to terms, and therefore there follows from the holding over an inference of law that a tenancy has been created upon the terms of the lease which has expired so far as they are not inconsistent with a tenancy from year to year, and the jury ought to so find.

E I will take the case where after the expiration of the term certain letters or communications pass between the landlord and tenant. When such a case arises the question for the jury is, whether the consent of both parties has been such as to create a yearly tenancy. Has there been consent in this case? It is clear that the landlord did consent. If the case stopped there, and there was no answer on the part of the tenant, it is clear that the inference of law would arise. If the letter of Mar. 24 can be construed so as to negative that inference of law, there is, I think, a question for the jury. Does that letter negative the implication which, I think, had arisen? I think that it does not, but that it rather confirms it; it admits that a new tenancy has been created, and asks for indulgence. The tenancy which had so been created could only be ended by a notice to quit at the end of the year. I think, therefore, that HAWKINS, J., has placed a wrong construction upon that letter, and has drawn a wrong inference from the facts. The appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—HAWKINS, J., held that there was no evidence against the defendant that he was tenant from year to year upon the terms of the old agreement. What is the law applicable to a case where a tenancy has expired and the tenant holds over and the landlord allows him to do so? The law is that, if it is shown that the landlord consented to the tenant holding over, and that the tenant agreed to hold over, there is an inference of law that the tenant holds over upon the old terms as tenant from year to year.

H What happened in this case at the expiration of the lease for one year? There was a direct statement from the landlord to the tenant that he consented to the tenant holding over. Speaking for myself, I say that, where the tenant does nothing but hold over with notice that the landlord is demanding rent from him as tenant upon the terms of the old agreement, the proper inference is that the tenant assents to hold over on the terms of the old agreement by remaining in possession and saying nothing at all. What is the result? As LORD MANSFIELD said, there is a tenancy from year to year on the terms of the old agreement, so far as they are consistent with a yearly tenancy. Something might be said or done by the tenant to negative that inference, but there is nothing of that kind here; the letter of

Mar. 24 confirms the inference that the tenant agreed to remain as tenant. The judgment, therefore, of HAWKINS, J., ought to be reversed, and this appeal allowed. A

A vessel which was “not under command” within art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1884, held nevertheless to be justified in making way through the water, for instance, to avoid some imminent danger or if she were very near to some port. A vessel is “not under command” if she cannot get out of the way; if she can be steered and can be stopped and can go ahead she is under command, unless, perhaps, she can only do so after great and unusual delay or if there is an imminent danger of a breakdown of her propelling power. The House of Lords will only reverse the concurrent finding of two courts below upon a question of fact if it is clearly or tolerably clearly demonstrated that such finding is erroneous, not upon a balance of probabilities. F

C Appeal by the owners of the P. Caland from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., FRY and LOPES, L.J.J., with nautical assessors), reported [1892] P. 191, affirming a decision of JEUNE, J., assisted by Trinity Masters, reported [1891] P. 313, by which he found the steamship P. Caland alone to blame for a collision which took place in the Straits of Dover on April 15, 1891, between that vessel and the steamship Glamorgan.

D The collision occurred between the steamships P. Caland and the Glamorgan, in the Straits of Dover, on the night of April 15, 1891. On that night the P. Caland, a screw-steamship of 2,584 tons gross, propelled by engines of 350-horse power nominal, was in the Straits of Dover, laden with a general cargo on a voyage from New York to Amsterdam. At about 8 p.m. she had passed the Varne Light, at a speed of about eleven knots. At about 8.15 p.m. a nut in the slide of the valve of the high-pressure cylinder worked loose, but, in consequence of the ship's proximity to the Varne Shoal, she could not be stopped to allow the engineer to repair the accident. Accordingly the slides of the high and low pressure cylinders were worked by hand, and an average speed of three to four knots was obtained. It was also stated by witnesses that there was reasonable apprehension that the engines might stop at any moment, and that it took longer time than usual to reverse them. In these circumstances the starboard anchor of the P. Caland was got ready to let go if necessary, her masthead light was taken down, and three red lights indicating a vessel "not under command" were substituted for it. There was a conflict of evidence as to what was done with the side lights, the owners of the Glamorgan alleging that the red light (the material light) was not exhibited till just before the collision, the owners of the P. Caland alleging that they had never been taken in, and were kept exhibited to indicate that the P. Caland was under way.

E In these circumstances the steamship Glamorgan, while on a voyage from Antwerp to Cardiff, was in the English Channel, when those on board of her sighted an unsteady white light on board the P. Caland, and shortly after the three red lights were seen on the starboard bow, when the white light disappeared. The Glamorgan's engines were thereupon eased to slow, and the helm was starboarded.

H But when the three red lights bore about five points on the Glamorgan's starboard bow, the red light of the P. Caland came into view, and she was seen to be coming ahead so as to cause risk of collision. The helm of the Glamorgan was at once hard-a-starboarded, and her engines were reversed at full speed, but the P. Caland came on and with her stem struck the starboard side of the Glamorgan, causing her to sink.

I By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1884 :

"Art. 5 (a). A ship, whether a steamship or a sailing ship, which from any accident is not under command, shall at night carry in the same position as the white light which steamships are required to carry, and, if a steamship, in place of that light, three red lights in globular lanterns, each not less than ten inches in diameter, in a vertical line one over the other, not less than three feet apart, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least two miles; . . . (c) The ships referred to in this article, when not making any way through the water shall not carry the side lights, but when making way shall carry them. (d) The lights . . . required to be shown by this article are to be taken by other ships as signals that the ship showing them is not under command, and cannot therefore get out of the way . . .”

Feb. 27, 1893. The following opinions by LORD HERSCHELL and LORD WATSON were read.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—This action was brought in respect of a collision which happened in the Straits of Dover between the steamships P. Caland and Glamorgan, by which the latter vessel was lost. The most important question raised depends upon the construction of the fifth article of the Collision Regulations. At the time of the collision the P. Caland had at her masthead, in place of the regulation white light, three red lights, indicating that she was not under command. The question is whether she was justified in exhibiting these lights. At the time when she thus exhibited them she was proceeding at a speed which must be taken to have been not less than four to five knots. Both the courts below have held that she cannot properly be said to have been not under command at the time in question.

Construing the article as a whole, it is certain that a vessel may not be under command within the meaning of those words as used in the article, and yet be making way through the water; for it is provided that, if making way through the water, a vessel shall carry the ordinary side-lights as well as the three red lights at her masthead. At the same time I desire to say that I do not think that because the rule contemplates that a vessel not under command may be justified in making way through the water, it therefore implies that a vessel in so disabled a condition is always justified in continuing so to make way. This must depend upon the circumstances, and in my opinion a vessel which cannot show that they were such as to justify her in taking this course, must be held to blame for not acting in a reasonable and seamanlike manner, even though she had complied with the statutory regulations. It never was intended that under all circumstances a vessel should be entitled to proceed at a considerable speed through the water, throwing upon other vessels, out of whose way she would ordinarily have had to get, the obligation to get out of her way, though the circumstances might no doubt be such as to justify that course. For example, it might be necessary, in order to avoid some danger which would otherwise be imminent. Or, again, if she were very near port, it might be reasonable and prudent to pursue her course.

With these preliminary observations I proceed to consider the construction of art. 5. In the Court of Appeal the Master of the Rolls expressed himself as follows:

“Now looking at the words of the statute, at the first part of the clause, which speaks of her not being under command, and the second part, her not being under command so that she cannot keep out of the way—taking those two together, it seems to me that the real construction of the rules is that she must, through some accident, be in such a position that she is not under command in this sense, that she could not keep out of the way of another vessel coming near her. But if she can be steered, and can be stopped, and can go ahead—which is necessary in order that she may be steered—then she is under command, and the apprehension of her being likely (however well founded) to be in a few moments out of command does not show that she is out of command at the moment spoken of”;

and the other learned judges concurred in this view.

A I cannot but think that this construction is somewhat too narrow. Suppose the vessel, though having steerage way on her and capable of being steered to port or starboard, yet, owing to some disablement, answered her helm but very slowly, so that, if an occasion for doing so should arise, she could not get out of the way of another vessel in the manner which such vessel would have reason to anticipate. And suppose, though she can stop and reverse, she can only do so after great and
B unusual delay. I am not satisfied that in either of these cases she might not be properly described as not under command, and not able to keep out of the way of other vessels. It is not necessary to dwell upon the point, as it has no application to the present case; but I wish to guard against being supposed to assent to so narrow a construction as appears to me to have been adopted by the court below.

C Again, suppose that, owing to a breakdown of the machinery, its ceasing to be capable of propelling the vessel is reasonably regarded as imminent and likely to occur at any moment, I am not satisfied that in this case a vessel may not properly be said, within the meaning of the rule, not to be under command. If she were to allow other vessels to continue their course and to manœuvre on the assumption that she would get out of their way, she might prove unable to take any action at the very time when a change of direction on her part could alone enable
D her to keep out of the way and thus avert disaster. It would certainly tend to safety if under such circumstances the rule required her to warn other vessels to keep out of her way, and I do not think any violence need be done to the language used to construe it as extending to such a case.

Even assuming, however, that the article will bear this construction, I am of opinion that the P. Caland cannot be said to have been out of command at the
E time of the collision. She was able to proceed at a rate which I think cannot have been less than four to five knots an hour. This speed was maintained, after the damage to the machinery presented itself, and the three red lights were exhibited for half to three-quarters of an hour before the collision. The two vessels were a considerable time locked together, and after they were separated the P. Caland steamed for half an hour before she became stationary. Even then it would appear
F that the machinery did not come to a standstill on account of its damaged condition, but was intentionally stopped for the purpose of repairing the damage. Under these circumstances, I cannot hold that, owing to the disablement of the machinery, the risk of its ceasing to work was so imminent that the vessel can be said not to have been under command within the meaning of the rule. I think, therefore, that she was not justified in exhibiting the three red lights at her masthead, and
G must be held to have infringed the Collision Regulations. And it appears to me impossible to say that this breach of the regulations was in no way connected with the collision which occurred, and cannot be said to have at all contributed to it. In my opinion, therefore, it has been rightly held that the P. Caland was to blame.

H The question whether the Glamorgan was also to blame is, to my mind, one of much greater difficulty, and depends upon whether she saw, or ought to have seen, the P. Caland's side-lights. If she did, or could have seen the red side-light of that vessel, it is not disputed that she must be held to blame. The question is, did she or could she have seen that side-light? The evidence of those on board the Glamorgan is distinct that this light was not visible; whilst the evidence of those on board the P. Caland that the light was exhibited is equally unequivocal.
I So far as regards their demeanour the learned judge before whom the action was tried saw no reason to give credence to one set of witnesses rather than to the other. Weighing all the probabilities, I confess I should myself be disposed to come to the conclusion that the red side-light was visible, and that those on board the Glamorgan having observed the three mast-head red lights, and being aware that they were approaching a disabled vessel, took it for granted that she was at a standstill, and their observations being directed, under this impression, to the mast-head lights, they failed to observe the red side-light, and accordingly bore down upon the P. Caland under the impression that she was stationary. But both the courts below have on the balance of probability thought it more probable that the red side-light was not visible than that, being visible, it was either unseen or disregarded by the Glamorgan. A

I quite agree with what has been said in this House in previous cases as to the importance of not disturbing a mere finding of fact in which both the courts below have concurred. I think such a step ought only to be taken when it can be clearly demonstrated that the finding was erroneous. In the present case, although I might probably myself have come to a different conclusion, I cannot say that any cardinal fact was disregarded or unduly estimated by the courts below. I can lay hold of nothing as turning the balance decisively the one way rather than the other. I think the decision of the question of fact at issue depends upon which way the balance of probability inclines, and I am not prepared to advise your Lordships that it so unequivocally inclines in the opposite direction to that indicated in the judgments of the courts below that this House would be justified in reversing the judgment appealed from. B C

LORD WATSON.—Whether the P. Caland did or did not, from the time when she came in sight of the Glamorgan until the vessels collided, show her side-lights, as well as the three red lights specified in art. 5 of the Collision Regulations, which she admittedly carried, appears to me to be the cardinal question in this appeal. If the P. Caland did not, during that period of time, exhibit side-lights, then she was clearly to blame; because, while she was making about four knots an hour through the water, her three red lights conveyed a distinct intimation to approaching vessels that she was stationary. On that hypothesis, I can find no ground for imputing either breach of the regulations or negligent seamanship to the Glamorgan. On the assumption that the P. Caland's side-lights were visible, I think it would be impossible to acquit the Glamorgan of fault. In that case the evidence does not disclose any circumstance which could justify her in steering her course across the bows of the P. Caland. D E

It would, however, be necessary to consider whether the latter vessel was in a condition which warranted her being navigated under signals appropriate to a steamship not under command, and yet making way through the water; and, if not, whether her use of regulation signals, which she was not entitled to assume, was in any degree contributory to the collision. There might possibly be circumstances in which such a misuse of signals might tend to mislead another vessel, and so aid in producing a collision between them. But my present impression is, that the natural effect of a steamship under command masquerading as a ship not under command would be to induce other vessels to give her a wider berth than they would have allowed if she had carried her ordinary foremast light. These questions do not arise for decision in the view which I take upon the main question of fact. But I take this opportunity of stating my entire concurrence in the observations which have been made by the Lord Chancellor as to the construction of art. 5 of the Regulations. F G

Whether the P. Caland did or did not properly exhibit her side-lights is a pure question of fact, mainly depending for its solution upon probabilities which are more or less matter of speculation. The President of the Admiralty Division came to the conclusion that her side-lights were not shown; and his view of the fact was accepted by all the judges of the Court of Appeal. In my opinion, it is a salutary principle that judges sitting in a court of last resort ought not to disturb concurrent findings of fact by the courts below, unless they can arrive at—I will not say a certain, because in such matters there can be no absolute certainty—but a tolerably clear conviction that these findings are erroneous. And the principle appears to me to be specially applicable in cases where the conclusion sought to be set aside chiefly rests upon considerations of probability. I may add that the principle was recognised as governing the decisions of this House in the Scottish appeal of Gray v. Turnbull (1). That case commenced, not in the Sheriff Court, but in the Court of Session, so that their Lordships were not debarred by any statute from reviewing H I

A findings of fact as well as of law. If the question had come before me as judge of first instance, I am not prepared to affirm that I would have answered it in the same way as the learned judges of the Probate Division and the Court of Appeal. But this I can say, that, having done my best to weigh the probabilities of the case, I am unable to resist the impression that, whatever may be my own leaning, their decision is as likely to be right as a finding the other way. In these circumstances, I cannot disregard the rule of the House, and I therefore assent to the judgment proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur. I am myself strongly disposed to think that the red side-light was visible. But it is a question of inference and balance of probabilities, and I quite fail to find any clear fact on which I would be justified in arriving at a conclusion different from that of the courts below. It is manifest that your Lordships would be most reluctant to differ from such a conclusion without clear and strong reasons.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur.

Case Stated by West Riding of Yorkshire Quarter Sessions.

Alfred Dyson, an undischarged bankrupt, was indicted on two counts alleging that he obtained credit for amounts in excess of £20 whilst not disclosing that he was an undischarged bankrupt contrary to the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 31. It was proved at the trial that the defendant had been adjudged bankrupt under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, on April 30, 1885, at Huddersfield County Court, and that he had never obtained his discharge from such bankruptcy. It was also proved that the defendant had since his bankruptcy carried on business in Huddersfield, and that on May 16, 1892, and June 3, 1892, respectively, goods to the value of £103 13s. 11d. and £163 2s. 6d. respectively were purchased upon credit by the defendant from Isaac Naylor, at Bradford, and that such goods were on the said dates respectively delivered to the defendant upon credit, and kept by him without any payment being made therefor. It was also proved that the defendant did not on either of the said dates, or at any other time, inform the said Isaac Naylor that he, the defendant, was an undischarged bankrupt, and that the said Isaac Naylor was not at the time the said credits or either of them were obtained aware of such fact.

It was proposed by counsel for the defendant to put questions to the witnesses called on behalf of the prosecution with a view to show that, although the above-mentioned credits had been obtained by the defendant without any information having been given that he was an undischarged bankrupt, and without the said Isaac Naylor having been aware of the fact, such credits had been so obtained by the defendant without intent to defraud, and it was submitted on behalf of the defendant that, if he could show that although the said credits were obtained as aforesaid they were so obtained without intent to defraud, he was entitled to an acquittal. It was objected by counsel on behalf of the prosecution that an intent to defraud was not an ingredient of the offence charged under s. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that an offence under the said section was proved upon proof that the defendant had obtained credit to the extent of £20 or upwards without giving the information specified in the section. The court was of opinion that for the purpose of determining whether or not an offence under the section had been committed it was immaterial to consider whether the credit had been obtained with or without an intent to defraud, and ruled that questions proposed to be put only with a view to show an absence of an intent to defraud could not be put, and directed the jury upon the question of fraudulent intent in accordance with the above opinion. At the request of counsel for the defendant the court consented to reserve this Case for the consideration of Her Majesty's judges in the event of the jury convicting the defendant. The jury convicted the defendant upon the two counts of the indictment, and he was sentenced by the court to six weeks imprisonment without hard labour. The question for the consideration of the court was whether the above-mentioned ruling and direction was right or wrong.

By s. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 :

"Where an undischarged bankrupt under this Act obtains credit to the extent of £20 or upwards from any person without informing such person that he is an undischarged bankrupt, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour . . ."

Lowenthal for the prosecution.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is an indictment under s. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a statute which says that where an undischarged bankrupt obtains credit to the extent of twenty pounds or upwards from any person without informing such person that he is an undischarged bankrupt, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and may be dealt with and punished as if he had been guilty of a misdemeanour under the Debtors Act, 1869. The jury have found that this man did obtain credit to the extent of £103 13s. 11d. and £163 2s. 6d. from a person with whom he dealt without informing such person that he was an undischarged bankrupt. It appears

A to me, therefore, that the whole purpose of the statute was fulfilled, and that everything that was necessary was proved before the quarter sessions. The only distinction between this and R. v. Peters (1) is, that there it was a cash transaction, whereas here it was not a cash transaction. That case clearly lays down the rule that it is immaterial whether it was a cash transaction or not. The words of the statute are "obtaining credit," and it is found that here the prisoner obtained
B goods on credit. The prisoner having obtained credit without giving the required information, I cannot entertain a doubt but that whether or not he had any intent to defraud he had done all that was necessary to bring him within the section, and that the conviction was perfectly right. It follows that the conviction must be sustained.

C HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and cannot entertain any doubt on the subject when I read the words of the section, namely, that

"where an undischarged bankrupt obtains credit to the extent of twenty pounds or upwards from any person without informing such person that he is an undischarged bankrupt, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

D The reference at the end of the section to the Debtors Act, 1869, to which our attention has been drawn by the learned counsel for the prisoner, is relied upon as showing that an intent to defraud is an essential element in the offence created by the section. I have looked at that Act, however, and am very much struck by the fact that all the offences there are offences in the creation of which the words "with intent to defraud" are used, or the words "unless the jury is satisfied that E he had no intent to defraud." It can hardly therefore have been intended by the legislature in the present Act to have made this an offence only where there is an intent to defraud. I am quite satisfied that, if it had been so intended, we should have found those words in the statute. I am therefore of opinion that this conviction must be affirmed.

F MATHEW, J.—An ingenious attempt is made in this case to incorporate s. 18 of the Debtors Act, 1869, into s. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and to read the latter section as if there were found at the end of the section these words: "And when any person is charged with any such offence, any evidence tending to show that the act charged was not committed with a guilty intent shall be taken into consideration." Is that the usual way to interpret statutes? It seems to me
G clear that it is not, because when you look at s. 18 of the earlier Act it is clear that it applies to proceedings before justices, and that its object is to enlarge the discretion of the justices under the general discretion conferred upon them by the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859 [repealed]. In my opinion this conviction should be affirmed.

H CAYE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question of intent does not arise in this case.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Conviction affirmed.

The word "permits" in s. 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872 [now s. 136 (1) of the Licensing Act, 1953] means "knowingly permits," and in the absence of knowledge, connivance or carelessness on the part of the landlord of a public house or his agent, a landlord cannot be convicted of an offence under that section of permitting drunkenness on licensed premises.

Case Stated by Chelmsford justices.

The appellant, a police inspector, laid an information against the respondent, the landlord of licensed premises in Chelmsford, for "permitting drunkenness" on the premises, contrary to the provisions of s. 13 of the Licensing Act, 1872. A police constable found a woman, R. L., drinking beer on the respondent's premises, with which she had been served by him or his barman. The constable had previously ordered the same R. L. out of other licensed premises on the ground that she was drunk, and after some conversation with her he ordered her off the respondent's premises. In the constable's opinion she was then drunk. The respondent gave evidence that there was nothing in R. L.'s appearance to show that she was drunk, and that he was quite unaware at the time that she was in that condition. The constable's evidence did not contradict the respondent's evidence as to the appearance of the woman. The justices believed the constable's statement that the woman was in fact drunk, but they also believed the respondent's evidence that he was ignorant of that fact when he served R. L. with drink, and they dismissed the information on that ground, but stated a Case at the request

A of the appellant. By the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 13 :

"If any licensed person permits drunkenness or any violent, quarrelsome, or riotous conduct to take place on his premises, or sells any intoxicating liquor to any drunken person, he shall be liable, etc."

C. E. Jones for the appellant.

B The respondent did not appear.

MATHEW, J.—In Somerset v. Hart (1) the court held that absence of knowledge, connivance, or carelessness on the part of the landlord of a public-house or his agent, upon an information against such landlord for "suffering gaming" upon his licensed premises, was a good ground upon which magistrates might dismiss such an information. "Suffering" is not to my mind distinguishable from "permitting." A licensee does not permit drunkenness if he does not know of its existence, or connives at it, or wilfully shuts his eyes to it. The magistrates here find on the evidence before them that the respondent did not "permit drunkenness." I see no ground for saying that there was no evidence to support such a finding. As to the wording of s. 14, which enacts that, if a publican "knowingly permits" D his premises to be the resort of prostitutes, he shall be guilty of an offence, the distinction is there inserted for an obvious reason. He must be shown to know the application of that term to the persons there resorting; otherwise there would be no offence in serving the women with beer, or permitting their presence on the premises.

I think this appeal must be dismissed on the ground that there was evidence E justifying the magistrates in dismissing the information, and I may add that I should probably have come to a similar conclusion on the evidence as stated to us.

HENN COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The terms of the earlier part of the section would, even without the decision of Somerset v. Hart (1) imply that, without knowledge, or connivance, or privity between the landlord and the agent, I who might have known of the offence being committed, there could be no "permitting." If it were otherwise the appellant's counsel must contend that, even if in the temporary absence of the landlord a quarrel took place in a public-house, the fact of such a quarrel having occurred would be sufficient to secure a conviction for "permitting quarrelsome or riotous conduct to take place on the premises." That cannot be so.

G In Somerset v. Hart (1) LORD COLERIDGE says that "suffering" without "knowing" is impossible. It is said that this decision was questioned in Bond v. Evans (2). It is obvious that, in this latter case, Somerset v. Hart (1) was not questioned on the point whether "suffering" would be possible without knowledge on the part of the landlord, but it was merely pointed out that, in Somerset v. Hart (1) there was something peculiar in the circumstances in that the servant H there was not in charge of the premises, and there had been no delegation of duty by the landlord. So understood Bond v. Evans (2) is not in conflict with the decision in Somerset v. Hart (1) at all. The court in Bond v. Evans (2) simply say that, given no delegation of authority to the person who commits or assists in the commission of the offences, they agree that there can be no "suffering" such an offence to be committed without "knowing" of its commission, and therefore it is equally I an authority with Somerset v. Hart (1) that a person cannot "permit" or "suffer" the commission of any of these licensing offences in s. 13 without "knowing" of their commission.

In Cundy v. Le Cocq (3), which turned on the last words of s. 13, the offence of "selling" intoxicating liquors to a drunken person was complete, because of the express words in the section defining the offence. But "permitting" in the other sections must imply "knowingly suffering." In the two other sections dealing with "permitting the premises to be the resort of prostitutes," or of "harbouring police constables when on duty," the appellant would have to contend that, without the word "knowingly," as there inserted, the offence might be committed without knowing the character of the woman, or the fact of the man being a constable. That would clearly involve great hardship, and therefore "knowingly" is inserted, as applicable to the character of the persons designated, and not as extending the sense of "permitting" or "suffering."

Creditors of a deceased trader whose business has been continued by his executors, when they come for an administration decree, must treat the continuance of the business as either proper or improper. If the business has been properly continued as between the executors and the creditors, or if the creditors choose to treat it so, the executors are entitled to be indemnified against all liabilities properly incurred in carrying it on. If it has been improperly continued and the creditors choose to treat the continuance as improper, they may proceed in the proper way to make the executors accountable for the value of the assets used in carrying on the business, and they may also follow the assets and obtain a charge on the business in the hands of the executors for the value of the assets misapplied, with interest thereon, and they may enforce the charge, if necessary, by means of a receiver and a sale. Then there can be no room for any claim to indemnity on the part of the executors. The charge in favour of the creditors must be satisfied first.

With regard to the extent of the executors' right to indemnity, there is no authority for limiting it to that part of the testator's estate which has been acquired by the executors since the death of the testator. They are entitled to a general indemnity out of the estate as against all persons claiming under the will. If a testator's business is carried on after his death in accordance with the provisions of the will, the indemnity of the executors is only limited by the amount of the assets which the testator has authorised the executors to employ in the business. If the business is carried on by the executors at the instance of the creditors without regard to the terms of the will, the executors have the ordinary rights of agents against their principals. But there is no reason in any case for limiting the indemnity to that portion of the assets which has come into existence or changed its form since the testator's death. An unsecured creditor has no right against a specific part of the assets. He can have no greater right in respect of one part of the assets than another. It is all one estate.

- E Their Lordships took time for consideration.

May 12, 1891. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This is an administration action brought by the appellants, who are the executors of one Luke Turner, to have the estate of John Gorton, of whom they were creditors, administered. The defendants, Ann Elizabeth Gorton and James William Gorton, are the executors of John Gorton. The other defendants are persons who have become creditors of these executors in respect of goods supplied for the purpose of the businesses of the testator which were carried on by them after his death. The appellants, by an originating motion, claimed to have it determined whether the assets of the businesses carried on by the testator at the time of his death, and then due and owing in respect of the said businesses, or belonging to the same, ought to be applied in payment of the debts due by the testator at the time of his death in priority to any claim of his executors for indemnity.

The debt due to the appellants arose under an agreement made between their testator, Luke Turner, and the testator in the administration suit on Sept. 25, 1874.

- H By this agreement Luke Turner agreed to sell his business of an elastic braid manufacturer to John Gorton and William Shemilt (who parted with his share to John Gorton and afterwards died), and his interest in the mill, machinery, and other effects, for £19,487, of which £2,000 was to be paid on the agreement being signed, and the balance, with interest, by annual instalments of £1,500 each, on every Sept. 26 until the whole of the purchase money was paid. In case of default
- I in payment of either principal or interest the whole balance of purchase money was to become due immediately. The £2,000 was paid on the execution of the agreement, and John Gorton paid the annual instalments of £1,500 down to Sept. 26, 1880. But, at the time of his death, on Dec. 30, 1883, three of the annual instalments remained unpaid, although the interest on the unpaid purchase money had been paid to Sept. 12 previous. Besides the business purchased from Luke Turner, Gorton also carried on the business of a yarn polisher upon other premises. By his will he gave uncontrolled discretion to his executors to carry on his businesses for such periods as they should think desirable.

They accordingly continued the same until September, 1887, when they stopped payment and called the creditors together. Prior to this date they had paid all the debts of the testator, except the debt due to the appellants, and £4,000 owing to Mrs. Caldwell, a sister of the testator, but they had incurred other liabilities in respect of the carrying on of the testator's business. Shortly after the death of John Gorton the solicitor then acting for his executors produced to the appellants' solicitor a statement purporting to show the assets of the businesses as exceeding the liabilities. But in this statement the mill, works, and machinery were valued at their cost price. James William Gorton, one of the respondents, states in his affidavit that very shortly after Gorton's death, he saw the appellants Barrs and Hasleham, and explained to them the general position of the estate. He adds:

"I also pointed out to them that I and my co-executrix were then carrying on the said businesses as carried on by the testator at the time of his death, and they informed me that we had better continue to do so."

In an affidavit in answer to this statement, Barrs and Hasleham deny that they ever informed J. W. Gorton that he and his co-executrix had better continue the businesses of the testator. They say:

"The said J. W. Gorton represented to us that, if the Anvil Street business [the business sold by Turner] was continued, the interest on the debt owing by the said John Gorton at his decease to the executors of the said Luke Turner would be paid as usual, and that he hoped after a time to pay instalments to reduce the debt, and we made some suggestions as to reducing the expenses of the businesses, and he promised to reduce the expenditure accordingly."

Balance-sheets of the Anvil Street business for the years 1884, 1885, and 1886 were regularly submitted to the appellants in accordance with the provisions of the agreement of 1874, and an account of the stock-taking of the other business was also regularly furnished to them.

The Court of Appeal, by the judgment now under the consideration of your Lordships, made a declaration in these terms:

"That the executors of John Gorton are entitled, as against and in priority to the persons to whom he was indebted at the time of his death, to be indemnified out of such part of the estate as has been acquired by the executors since his death against debts or liabilities incurred by the said executors in carrying on his businesses to the full amount of such debts and liabilities, or, if the said executors be in default to the said John Gorton's estate, then to the full amount of such debts and liabilities after deducting the amount in respect of which the executors are so in default."

The right of the executors to an indemnity out of such part of the estate as has been acquired by them since the death of the testator, and the limitation of their indemnity to that part of the estate, appears to have been based, in the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J., upon the view that this after-acquired property was not an asset of the testator against which his creditors could have execution. He says:

"Now what is the right of the creditor of the deceased? He is a creditor, he has no equitable rights as distinguished from legal rights against the assets of the deceased. His right is to sue the executor at law, and get a judgment at law, de bonis testatoris, and under that to seize, under a fi. fa., the assets of the deceased in the hands of the executors at the time of his death: but he has nothing to do with future-acquired property."

COTTON, L.J., I gather, took the same view, though he does not state the proposition definitely. After saying that the executors could not, so far as regards the original assets of the testator, claim an indemnity as against the creditors of the testator, he continues:

"Where there are liabilities undertaken under the direction of the testator's

- A will, they are entitled to an indemnity in respect of them out of the assets acquired by the executors after the testator's death. The creditors of the testator say, there are assets of our testator, and he could not, by declaring a trust for you to perform, give you any right of indemnity as against the property. That is not correct."
- B With all deference, I am unable to concur in the distinction drawn between the assets which come into the hands of the executors at the time of the death of the testator, and property which, in their capacity of executors, they afterwards acquire. Abbott v. Parfitt (1) appears to be a distinct authority that property so acquired is as much assets of the testator as that which was in his possession at the time of his death. It was there held that the price of goods sold to the defendant by the executors who had carried on their testator's business, no part of the materials of which had belonged to the testator, would, when recovered, be assets of the testator, and I do not think it is possible, on principle, to maintain the suggested distinction.
- C Could an executor, having property in his hands to which his only title was that of executor, plead to an action by a creditor plene administravit? It seems to me that such a question admits of but one answer. I could, indeed, understand the view that, if the executors had come under liability in acquiring any assets in their hands, they would be entitled to an indemnity against such liability out of that asset before it could be made available for creditors. But this is not the effect of the declaration made by the court below. All after-acquired property, however acquired, even though it has been purchased with the proceeds of the sale of a part of the estate possessed by the testator at the time of his death, is treated as one subject-matter out of which the executors are entitled to their indemnity. I cannot think that the executors can be so entitled, if they cannot make good their claim to an indemnity generally against the whole of the testator's estate. I think it is clear that, where a business has been carried on under such an authority as was conferred upon the executors by the will of this testator, they would be entitled to a general indemnity out of the estate as against all persons claiming under the will. But I take it to be equally clear that they could not, by reason only of such authority, maintain this right against the creditors of the testator. The executors would no doubt be entitled to carry on a business of the testator for such reasonable time as was necessary to enable them to sell his business property as a going concern, and would, even as against his creditors, be entitled to an indemnity in respect of the liabilities properly incurred in so doing. But, in the present case, the businesses were carried on for a period of three years; and it is obvious that this was not done merely for the purpose of effecting a sale. I agree with the contention of the learned counsel for the appellants that the mere fact that a creditor stood by under such circumstances, and did not immediately take steps to enforce his debt, would not of itself entitle the executors, as against him, to be indemnified out of the estate.
- D But, when all the circumstances of the case are considered, I do not think this is the true view of them. It is necessary to look somewhat closely at the position of affairs at the time of the testator's death, and at what took place afterwards. Three of the annual instalments of £1,500 each were then overdue; and, although a balance-sheet was exhibited to the appellants which disclosed a large surplus it was on the face of it shown to be arrived at by valuing all the business premises and machinery at cost price. Any business man must have known, not only that this would be wholly different from the breaking-up price, but that it did not afford any real measure of what could be obtained if the sale were of a going concern, to say nothing of the uncertainty of finding a purchaser for such a subject. I do not place any reliance upon the allegation, denied by the appellants, that they informed one of the executors that the business had better be continued. But, before referring to the statement which they admit they made, I must bring to your Lordships' notice some of the provisions in the agreement under which the debt was incurred. I have not hitherto adverted to them, but they appear to me to have a material bearing upon the question to be determined. Luke Turner, when he sold his business and premises to the testator Gorton, was not content to rely merely on his general credit for payment of the purchase money. He required the purchasers to agree that they, and the survivor of them, would, until the whole of the purchase money was paid, carry on the business to the best of their skill and ability. The business was to be carried on subject to the supervision and inspection of William Barrs and John Wilkinson. The purchasers also undertook to keep proper books and accounts, and to furnish from time to time balance-sheets showing the state of the business; and the inspectors or other persons appointed by Luke Turner, or his executors, were authorised, if not satisfied with the carrying on of the business, or if it was discontinued, to enter upon the premises and dispossess the purchasers, and to take possession of the engine, machinery, and other effects assigned.

I agree with the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine that the agreement to carry on the business applied only to the purchasers, and did not extend to the executors of the survivor of them. Nevertheless, I think the provisions I have just recited throw considerable light upon the action of the appellants. They knew that, if the businesses were sold, there was a risk that the estate would not realise enough to pay their debts, and they knew too what powers they possessed as regards the Anvil Street business under the agreement of September, 1874. They were aware also that the testator's businesses were being carried on; they received from time to time balance-sheets showing the result of the trading; and they admit that, at the interview with J. W. Gorton shortly after Turner's death, he told them that, if the Anvil Street business were continued, he hoped after a time to pay instalments to reduce the debt, and that they made some suggestions as to reducing the expenses of the businesses. Under the circumstances, I think the proper inference is that the businesses were not merely continued for the benefit of those interested under the will, but that they were also carried on with the assent of the representatives of Luke Turner for the purpose of securing the payment of the debt due to them. If this be the true view, it can hardly be contested that the executors of Gorton are, as against the appellants, entitled to be indemnified out of their testator's estate against the liabilities which they have properly incurred. The declaration of the court below gives them a more limited remedy. The difference is probably in the present case not a practical one. But the declaration as it stands directs an unnecessary, and what may be an expensive, inquiry. I think, therefore, that the order ought to be varied by omitting the limitation upon the indemnity and the consequent inquiry.

Since writing my opinion I have had the advantage of reading the opinion prepared by LORD MACNAGHTEN. It is not necessary to determine in the present case what would be the proper order if the appellants had alleged and established that the businesses of the testator had, as against them, been carried on without lawful authority; but I am disposed to concur in the view which he has expressed as to the right of a creditor under such circumstances. I understood it to be stated at the Bar that it had been agreed that the costs of both parties should come out of the estate. This appears to have been the course taken in the litigation hitherto, and I do not advise your Lordships to interfere with the existing order as to costs. But I do not think your Lordships ought by your judgment to relieve the appellants in a suit of this nature from paying the costs of the appeal. The respondent executors should have the difference (if any) in the costs, taxed as between party and party, and taxed as between solicitor and client, out of the estate.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, after stating the facts: On the question as presented to your Lordships I have not been able to find so much assistance as I could have wished either in the judgment of the learned Vice-Chancellor, or in that of the Court of Appeal. The Vice-Chancellor treats the question before him as arising on a direct claim by the creditors of the businesses carried on by the executors to be paid out of the estate pari passu with the persons who were creditors of the

A testator at the time of his death. And the whole of his judgment from first to last is devoted to combating that claim and some very insufficient reasons on which it seems to have been founded. I need hardly remind your Lordships that no such claim was made at your Lordships' Bar. The persons with whom the executors dealt, who are still unpaid, did not claim to be creditors of the testator. Besides their right against the executors personally, the only right they asserted

B was the right to stand in the place of the executors against the assets, and to have the benefit of such indemnity as the executors might prove to be entitled to. I turn to the judgment of the Court of Appeal, but that is more disappointing still. The lords justices assume as a matter not open to controversy the only point which was really in contest here. Without explanation or comment, they take it for granted that the testator's businesses were continued for the benefit of his creditors.

C Under these circumstances it is, I think, necessary to begin at the beginning, and to examine the case made by the appellants, who were, as I have said, plaintiffs in the action and applicants on the summons. Your Lordships are familiar with the distinction between the usual administration order and an order founded on breach of trust, a distinction in principle which is not affected by the recent changes in practice and procedure. Keeping this distinction in view, I would

D ask your Lordships to observe that neither in the pleadings nor in the evidence are the executors charged with wilful default or any other misconduct. The writ in the action asks for the usual order, coupled with the appointment of a receiver and manager of the testator's businesses, and it asks for nothing more. No statement of claim was delivered, and no affidavits were filed in the action. The summons, on which alone affidavits were filed, also asks for the usual order. And

E indeed I apprehend it would not be competent for an applicant on an originating summons to ask for or obtain otherwise than by consent an order founded on breach of trust or injuries pointing to wilful default. Moreover, it will be observed that both the writ and the summons treat the two businesses in their then actual state and condition as part of the testator's estate. So far the case is perfectly consistent, and the proper relief is asked. I now come to what is, in my opinion,

F a startling inconsistency. Asking for the usual order, the summons also asks for a declaration that the executors are not entitled as against the testator's creditors to any indemnity in respect of liabilities incurred in carrying on the testator's businesses. In other words, the appellants adopt the action of the executors, and take the fruits of their exertions in specie, and at the same time, and for the very same action, they claim to visit them with the loss of all their expenditure,

G and that without raising any issue which the executors could meet—without any finding that the assets have been wasted—without even any allegation of misconduct.

On what ground, I ask, is this claim based? Is it merely on the ground that the executors have traded without authority and beyond the period required for getting in the assets? Then the claim must hold good whether the trading brings a profit or a loss. The result of the trading is immaterial. Is it on the ground

H that the trading has diminished the assets? There is no finding on the subject. There is no admission to that effect. There is no inquiry to ascertain the result of the trading. The penalty invoked is not intended to be measured by reference to loss or diminution of assets. There is not, I believe, a shadow of authority for such a claim as that put forward by the appellants. It is contrary to all principle.

I Creditors of a deceased trader whose business has been continued by his executors, when they come for an administration decree, must treat the continuance of the business as either proper or improper. If the business has been properly continued as between the executors and the creditors, or if the creditors choose to treat it so, which comes to the same thing, the executors are entitled to be indemnified against all liabilities properly incurred in carrying it on. If it has been improperly continued, and the creditors choose to treat the continuance as improper (which, of course, they are not bound to do), they may proceed in the proper way to make the executors accountable for the value of the assets used in carrying on the business, and they may also follow the assets and obtain a charge on the business in the hands of the executors for the value of the assets misapplied, with interest thereon; and they may enforce the charge, if necessary, by means of a receiver and a sale. Then there can be no room for any claim to indemnity on the part of the executors. The charge in favour of the trust estate must be satisfied first. The executors can only take what is left. But the creditors must do one thing or the other. Though they are not bound by what they do in ignorance, and may, by leave of the court, sue in respect of wilful default after having taken the usual order, they cannot approbate and reprobate in one breath. They cannot claim the assets of the business as a going concern in the state and condition in which those assets happen to be at the moment when they choose to intervene, and at the same time refuse the executors indemnity in respect of liabilities incurred in carrying on the business.

It is, I think, important to place this matter on its true footing; otherwise there may be great confusion in the administration of estates. This appeal is an illustration of the expense and delay which may be occasioned in a simple case by the disregard of elementary principles. Whether the testator's businesses were or were not continued properly, whether there has or has not been a dealing with the assets of which the creditors might have complained, the order which the appellants seek to restore is, I think, one which cannot stand. The appeal therefore, in my opinion, must fail.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence, and said that he could not doubt that the proper conclusion was that the testator's businesses were carried on by the executors under the power contained in the will, with the sanction of the appellants, for the benefit of the estate and in the interest of the creditors as well as in the interest of the beneficiaries, and, further, that the executors could not have been charged as on an admission, and continued:] One word as to the extent of the executors' indemnity. The order under appeal limits it to that part of the testator's estate which is described in the order as having been "acquired by the executors since the death of the testator." I am not aware of any authority for splitting the assets in that way. If a testator's business is carried on after his death in accordance with the provisions of the will, which, I think, is the true view in this case, the indemnity of the executors is only limited by the amount of the assets which the testator has authorised the executors to employ in the business. If the business is carried on by the executors at the instance of the creditors without regard to the terms of the will, the executors, I suppose, have the ordinary rights of agents against their principals. But I can see no reason in any case for limiting the indemnity to that portion of the assets which may have come into existence or changed its form since the testator's death. An unsecured creditor has no right against any specific part of the assets. He can have no greater right in respect of one part of the assets than another. It is all one estate. His right is to see that the executors get in the estate and apply it in due course in payment of debts, and he may sue in equity, as the appellants have done, to enforce that right. It appears to me, therefore, that the order of the Court of Appeal should be varied by omitting the words which limit the indemnity of the executors and the inquiry consequential on that limitation.

LORD HANNEN.—I have had the advantage of reading the opinions which have just been delivered by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me, and I concur in the opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal, with the modifications suggested, should be affirmed.

Bankruptcy—Loan to trader—Interest varying with profits—Interest varying downwards from fixed rate—Contract too vague to be enforced—Bankruptcy of borrower—Right of lender to prove—Partnership Law Amendment Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict., c. 86), s. 1, s. 5.

By the Partnership Law Amendment Act, 1865, s. 1: "The advance of money by way of loan to a person engaged or about to engage in any trade or undertaking upon a contract in writing with such person that the lender shall receive a rate of interest varying with the profits . . . shall not of itself constitute the lender a partner with the person or persons carrying on such trade or undertaking, or render him responsible as such." By s. 5: "In the event of any such trader . . . being adjudged bankrupt, the lender . . . shall not be entitled to recover any portion of his principal, or of the profits or interest payable in respect of such loan . . . until the claims of the other creditors of the said trader for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied."

A loan was made to a trader at a fixed rate of interest payable half-yearly, but on the further terms that if, by reason of the deficiency of the profits, any portion of the half-yearly payments of interest could not be made, then an allowance was to be made to the trader in respect of the same in a fair and reasonable manner.

F

Held by the Divisional Court: under this agreement, the rate of interest was to vary with the profits within the meaning of ss. 1 and 5 of the Act of 1865, and, therefore, the lender's right to prove in the trader's bankruptcy must be postponed until the other creditors had been paid in full.

G

Semble: the Act applied wherever the rate of interest varied with the profits, whether such variation was to be upward or downward from a fixed standard rate.

H

Held by the Court of Appeal: the provision as to making an allowance in respect of the interest was so vague that it did not guide the court with any certainty to the mode of calculating the "due allowance", and, therefore, the whole agreement was void; as there was then no contract to receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, the lender could prove for the balance of the loan in the ordinary way and his rights were not postponed.

Appeal from the decision of the county court judge of Norwich reversing the decision of the trustee in bankruptcy of John Vince and admitting Dudley Baxter to prove for the sum of £2,399 18s. 3d. on an equality with all the other creditors of the debtor.

The loan, for which Baxter sought to prove against Vince's estate, had been made by him to Vince under the terms of an agreement, dated Oct. 28, 1889, and made between Baxter and Vince, which provided :

"An agreement made and entered into Oct. 28, 1889, between John Vince, of East Dereham, in the county of Norfolk, merchant, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, of the one part, and Dudley Baxter, of Atherstone, in the county of Warwick, solicitor, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, of the other part. Whereas, by a recent audit of the books of account of the trade and business of the said John Vince, there appears, according to the statement thereof signed by the said John Vince, that there is now due to him the said John Vince for credits £4,252 18s. 5d., and for liabilities owing by the said John Vince £2,698 6s. 9d. which he hereby agrees to discharge within three months, and there are no other debts or incumbrances in any way affecting the same, as the said John Vince doth hereby declare, which is hereby agreed shall be the basis of the proposal hereinafter made. And whereas the said John Vince has accordingly requested the said Dudley Baxter to lend and advance him the sum of £4,500 on his depositing with him the said Dudley Baxter the deeds and writings relating to a freehold house and premises at Dereham aforesaid called Beech Hurst, and freehold granaries there now owned by and in the occupation of the said John Vince, and also a policy of £200 in the Guardian Life Office, and of £100 in the Clerical and Medical Life Office, in part security for the same, which said sum the said Dudley Baxter has agreed to advance upon the terms and in the matter herein-after appearing. It is witnessed that, for the consideration aforesaid, and in consideration of the sum of £4,500 sterling to the said John Vince paid by the said Dudley Baxter, the receipt whereof the said John Vince doth hereby acknowledge, it is hereby mutually agreed by and between the said John Vince and the said Dudley Baxter, that the said John Vince shall and will discharge all his said debts within the time aforesaid, and that the said Dudley Baxter shall not call in any portion of the said sum of £4,500, or the said John Vince pay in any portion of the same for a term of ten years from the date hereof, but that the said John Vince shall and will punctually pay interest on the same to the said Dudley Baxter in the meantime by two regular half-yearly payments on April 28 and Oct. 28 in each year of £462 10s. for every half-year during the said term, and that if any interest shall not be so paid for one calendar month, then that the said principal sum of £4,500 may then be called in; and that in case the said John Vince should be unable to pay unto the said Dudley Baxter any portion of the half-yearly payments upon any part of the said sum of £4,500 by reason of the deficiency of the profits of the said John Vince, then and upon every such occasion a due allowance shall be made by the said Dudley Baxter to the said John Vince in respect of the same in a fair reasonable manner, and that the said John Vince for that purpose shall and will from time to time keep proper books of account relating to the said business and all transactions whatsoever, and send and transmit to the said Dudley Baxter a full and correct statement in writing of all matters and things whatsoever which in any way concern his said business, and which may have taken place during that time,

A which shall be audited by a professional accountant. Provided, nevertheless, and it is hereby agreed and declared by and between the said parties, that the said Dudley Baxter shall not thereby be considered in any way as a partner of the said John Vince. As witness, etc."

B A sum of £461 10s. had been paid by Vince as interest on the loan, when on Jan. 20 a receiving order was made against Vince, and he was adjudicated bankrupt. In May a proof was put in against the bankrupt's estate by Baxter for the sum of £2,399 18s. 3d., being the balance due to him on the loan made by him to the bankrupt. On June 17, the proof was rejected by the trustee under the provisions of s. 5 of the Partnership Law Amendment Act, 1865, for all purposes except for the purpose of receiving a dividend after all the other creditors had been paid in full, on the ground that

C "the advance was made by way of loan to a person engaged or about to engage in business, on a contract in writing with that person that the lender should receive a rate of interest varying with the profits."

D The county court judge reversed the decision of the trustee, and admitted Baxter to prove on an equality with all the other creditors. The trustee appealed.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Eversley for the creditor Baxter.

E VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed, that the learned county court judge was wrong in the conclusion at which he arrived, and that the contention of the respondent cannot be upheld. I think that the Partnership Law Amendment Act, 1865, applies where the rate of interest varies with the profits, whether it be upward or only downward from a fixed rate of interest mentioned in the agreement. I do not say that it is impossible an agreement might not be so framed that there might be a variation of interest downwards and yet not be within the Act, but to be outside the Act an agreement must be so framed as to exclude interest if payable out of the profits. In the present case, F it is obvious that the parties intended that the interest should be payable out of the profits; in such a case it makes no difference whether the rate of interest is a rate varying downwards only, or upwards and downwards. Let us look at the agreement from their point of view. Suppose it had said interest at 5 per cent, paid half-yearly—I have deliberately selected a rate of interest that is not an extravagant one—and it had said further "or at such other interest as may be G fair and reasonable, having regard to the profits." The moment you introduce the words "having regard to the profits" it is plain that the interest is payable out of the profits, or a reduction is to be made, having regard to the profits. It was very properly conceded by the respondent that such an agreement as the one I have suggested would be within the meaning of the Act of 1865, and, if that is so, H we must see how the present agreement varies from the suggested one. It only varies in that there is a condition introduced on the happening of which reduction of interest is to take place, that

I "in case the said John Vince should be unable to pay unto the said Dudley Baxter any portion of the half-yearly payments upon any part of the said sum of £4,500 by reason of the deficiency of the profits of the said John Vince, then and upon every such occasion a due allowance shall be made by the said Dudley Baxter to the said John Vince in respect of the same in a fair and reasonable manner."

This condition does not take the case out of the Act. Under the circumstances it seems to me that, starting with the premises that I do, the fact that the interest varies only one way is immaterial, if it is contemplated that it shall be paid out of profits. Nothing, therefore, remains but to see whether, if the rate of interest was not paid, the borrower could have compelled the lender to make a reduction in the rate of interest. The question then is, if the court thinks that the nonpayment of interest was brought about by reason of the "deficiency of the profits," would it then fix a proper reduction; and, in order to decide this, one must ascertain the circumstances at the time the agreement was entered into, or the rate of profit that was expected to be made. I do not see why the court should not do this. This agreement was, in my opinion, an agreement under which the lender was to receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, and, therefore, the decision of the county court judge must be reversed.

HENN COLLINS, J.—It was said here that, because there was a maximum rate of interest fixed by this agreement, there could not be a "rate of interest varying with the profits." This argument cannot be sustained. Here the rate of interest was about 20 per cent., which is a normal rate for a business concern, and, that being so, what is the meaning of the agreement? It means that, when the prospective probabilities of the business are exhausted, the creditor has an interest in the concern. The interest he received, therefore, varied with the profits within the meaning of the Act. The difficulty I felt on the construction of the agreement has been partly removed by the argument of the respondent's counsel, neither of whom contended that the inability to pay the interest which brought the reduction clause into force was not an inability arising out of the profits. If it is admitted that the source from which the interest was to be paid was the profits, and that the inability to pay the interest was the ground upon which the reduction was to be let in under the clause in the agreement, viz.,

"in case the said John Vince should be unable to pay unto the said Dudley Baxter any portion of the half-yearly payments upon any part of the said sum of £4,500 by reason of the deficiency of the profits of the said John Vince, then and upon every such occasion a due allowance shall be made by the said Dudley Baxter to the said John Vince in respect of the same in a fair and reasonable manner," then, as the inability is merely an inability to pay out of the profits, we come to the Act of 1865. The idea of this agreement was to tie the lender to the fortunes of the partnership. I am of opinion that counsel were right in admitting that the source from which the interest was to be drawn was the profits received. The case comes within the Act, and the appeal must be allowed.

The creditor, Baxter, appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Eversley for Baxter.

Muir Mackenzie for the trustee in bankruptcy.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the creditor, Baxter, lent to the bankrupt £4,500, and now desires to prove in the bankruptcy of the debtor for that loan, so as to get a dividend in the ordinary way upon that loan. The claim to so prove is resisted upon the ground that the lender had entered in an agreement with the bankrupt in such terms as to bring himself within s. 5 of the Partnership Law Amendment Act, 1865, and was, therefore, prevented, by the terms of that Act, from so proving for that sum.

That objection raises the question whether, upon the true construction of this agreement, the terms of it have brought the lender within the provisions of s. 5 of the Act of 1865. The court is bound to construe this agreement if possible, but before the court can construe it there must be reasonable stipulations to which a meaning can be given. On looking at the agreement and at the clause therein as to a due allowance being made in respect of the payment of interest upon a deficiency in profits, I am of opinion that the agreement in that respect is worded so artificially and mysteriously that I cannot tell what is the meaning of that stipulation. I cannot fix any definite meaning to what the parties have said in that clause. If, then, I cannot attach any definite meaning to that clause, I cannot hold that there was a contract that the rate of interest was to vary with the profits

A within the meaning of s. 5 of the Act of 1865. I cannot say what is the real meaning of that clause, and we must, therefore, treat this instrument as not binding in any respect.

B What, then, is the result? The creditor lent his money, and that money was to be repaid. From the terms of the agreement, we cannot tell how it was to be repaid. It must, therefore, be repaid in the ordinary way, and the creditor has a right to prove for his loan as for money lent, and to recover that sum in the ordinary way in which money is recovered in the Bankruptcy Court. This passage from LEAKE ON CONTRACTS (3rd Edn.), p. 591, seems to me to be a correct statement of the law in respect of such an agreement as this:

C "A promise must be reasonably certain, and if the parties have expressed the matter of their agreement in such uncertain or imperfect terms that it is impossible to ascertain any definite meaning, the agreement is necessarily void; for in every deed there must be such a degree of moral certainty as to leave in the mind of a reasonable man no doubt of the intent of the parties."

This appeal must be allowed.

D BOWEN, L.J.—I entirely agree, but, as we are differing from the judgment of the court below, I will add my own reasons. The question is whether this is a case of money lent under an agreement by which the rate of interest is to vary with the profits of the borrower's business. If it is, the Partnership Law Amendment Act, 1865, applies, and the appeal fails. If it is not, some relief must be granted to the creditor, Baxter. The answer to this question depends upon the consideration of the agreement made between the parties.

E There is no law applicable to this case except the rule which has been read by the Master of the Rolls. In my opinion, the entire agreement depends for its efficacy as to this case upon the clause as to the payment of interest, which is as follows:

F "And that in case . . . Vince should be unable to pay unto . . . Baxter any portion of the half-yearly payments upon any part of the said sum of £4,500 by reason of the deficiency of the profits of . . . Vince, then and upon every such occasion a due allowance shall be made by . . . Baxter to . . . Vince in respect of the same in a fair reasonable manner."

G If it were possible to collect from the rest of the agreement what measure of fairness, or what standard of allowance, was to be adopted, we might then have to decide whether this agreement was within the terms of the Act of 1865. It seems to me, however, impossible to find in this agreement, or in the circumstances of the case, any measure at all to guide us with any certainty to the mode of calculating the "due allowance." With what are we to compare the profits made when an allowance is said to be due? With the profits actually made in the business when the agreement was entered into? Or with the sum of £925, the yearly fixed interest? Or with the amount of the profits which the parties expected would be made after the loan and agreement? The trustee in bankruptcy, indeed, asserted that the last was the proper measure. I myself cannot see to which view the agreement itself can guide us. If the last mentioned was the measure intended by the agreement, it is so uncertain what it would be as to make the operation of the clause a mere matter of chance. Pearce v. Watts (1) is an illustration of a stipulation being so uncertain as to make a contract incapable of being enforced. This agreement is, in my opinion, incapable of receiving any certain construction.

I The effect of that upon the agreement is not that we can cut adrift from the agreement that part which is so uncertain, but that the agreement is entirely ineffectual. Even if we could cut adrift that part of the agreement, it is the only part which can possibly sustain the respondent's contention. That cannot be done, however, and the agreement cannot be enforced. What is the result? Justice and good sense demand that the lender shall be able to get his money back, for the Act of 1865 does not apply at all when there is no agreement which can be enforced, as is the case here; he can prove for his principal and 5 per cent. interest in the ordinary way. The reasons upon which the judgment of the court below seems to have proceeded were, that the interest was to be paid out of profits, and that the rate was to vary by comparing the actual profits with the expected profits. That is far too uncertain to be enforced. That judgment was wrong, and this appeal must be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—If the agreement had clearly given some mode of measuring the allowance to be made, I think that the judgment of the court below would have been right, and the case within s. 5 of the Partnership Law Amendment Act, 1865. When, however, the question as to how the “due allowance” is to be ascertained under the agreement comes to be argued, it becomes more and more uncertain. The judges in the court below did not agree as to that. The measure suggested, namely, the amount of the profits expected to be earned when the agreement was made, is far too vague, and cannot be worked out, or be enforced. This part of the agreement cannot be separated from the rest of the agreement, and the entire agreement falls to the ground. There was, therefore, no agreement within the Act of 1865, and this appeal must be allowed.

Company—Debenture—Floating charge on property of company—Need of registration as bill of sale—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict., c. 31), s. 4—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict., c. 43), s. 17.

Company—Charge on property—Registration—Bill of sale—Charge registrable under Companies Acts not registrable as a bill of sale.

A joint-stock company, registered under the Companies Acts, issued debentures creating a floating charge over all its undertaking and property. The company was wound-up, and execution creditors of the company claimed that the charge was void as the debentures had not been registered under the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882.

Held: on the true construction of s. 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, charges on the property of an incorporated company, for the registration of which statutory provision had already been made by the Companies Acts, were not bills of sale within the scope of the section; the words “other incorporated company” in the exempting provision in s. 17 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878)

A Amendment Act, 1882, were not to be limited by being construed ejusdem generis with the preceding words "any mortgage [or] loan [company]," (and, in any case, a company which was authorised to raise money on loan or mortgage would be ejusdem generis with a "mortgage or loan" company); and, therefore, the debentures need not have been registered as bills of sale and were valid without registration.

Notes. The Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, have been repealed, and are now replaced by the Companies Act, 1948. The provisions as to registration of charges under this Act are contained in Part III, ss. 95–106.

Appeal by the holders of debentures issued by the Standard Manufacturing Co., Ltd., from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster holding that the debentures were registrable under the Bills of Sale Acts.

The Standard Manufacturing Co. was registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, for the purpose of manufacturing frillings, etc. In 1888 the company issued debentures under its borrowing powers. In February, 1889, several creditors of the company recovered judgments against the company, and writs of execution were issued. On May 13, 1889, a debenture holder's action was commenced by James Lowe against the company. On May 20, 1889, possession of the property comprised in a second series of debentures was taken by Mr. Gillibrand on behalf of the Realisation and Debenture Corpn. of Scotland. On May 27 a petition was presented in the Palatine Court of the Duchy of Lancaster for the winding-up of the company and an order for winding-up was made on Aug. 7, 1889.

A summons was then taken out to determine whether the debentures were void as against the execution creditors. James Lowe's debenture was to secure £50 with interest at 6 per cent., and was in form a charge by the company "on its undertaking and all its property present and future." The debenture was issued subject to conditions endorsed thereon. The third of such conditions was as follows:

"The charge created by this debenture shall be a floating security, and accordingly the company may in the course of its business and for the purpose of carrying on the same deal with the property hereby charged in such manner as the company may think fit, and in particular may sell the same, may pay and receive money, and may declare and pay dividends out of profits."

The second series of debentures were granted in November, 1888, to the Realisation and Debenture Corpn. of Scotland, Ltd. The debentures issued in this

B "And the company doth hereby as beneficial owners charge with such payments all its present and future stock, goods, chattels, and effects, and all its real property and interest in lands, and also all its present and future plant, machinery, stock (manufactured and unmanufactured), book and other debts, goodwill, and assets, and generally all the present and future property, real and personal, and undertaking of the company, all of which premises of every kind above specified are intended to be included in the term property whenever used herein, and the company will forthwith, if and when required by the corporation, at the cost of the company, execute and do all such assurances and things for further or more perfectly assuring the property to the corporation or to such persons as the corporation shall nominate as trustees for it, as shall by the corporation from time to time be required."

C The third condition endorsed on these debentures was as follows :

D "The debentures of this series shall rank pari passu as a first charge upon the property as within defined, and without any preference or priority one over another, and shall be a floating security, but no part of the property shall at any time hereafter and before payment in full of the whole of this issue of debentures be in any way charged or mortgaged by the company so as to rank pari passu with or in priority to the charge hereby created, nor shall any part of the real or leasehold property of the company be sold, transferred, alienated, or otherwise dealt with in any manner without the consent in writing of the corporation first obtained, nor shall any part of the property of the company other than the said real or leasehold property be sold, transferred, alienated, or otherwise dealt with in any manner except in the ordinary course of the business of the company."

E Condition 6 provided that the principal moneys secured should become payable immediately if any execution was sued out against the company. Condition 7 provided for the appointment of a receiver. These debentures were also secured by a trust deed dated Dec. 3, 1888.

F The summons was heard by the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who held, upon the authority of Jenkinson v. Brandley Mining Co. (1), that the debentures required registration under the Bills of Sale Acts, and that in consequence of the want of registration the execution creditors had priority. The debenture holders appealed.

G By the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 4 :

H "The expression 'bill of sale' shall include bills of sale, assignments, transfers, declarations of trust without transfer, inventories of goods with receipt thereto attached, or receipts for purchase moneys of goods, and other assurances of personal chattels, and also powers of attorney, authorities, or licenses to take possession of personal chattels as security for any debt, and also any agreement, whether intended or not to be followed by the execution of any other instrument, by which a right in equity to any personal chattels, or to any charge or security thereon, shall be conferred, but shall not include the following documents; that is to say, assignments for the benefit of the creditors of the person making or giving the same, marriage settlements, transfers or assignments of any ship or vessel or any share thereof, transfers of goods in the ordinary course of business of any trade or calling, bills of sale of goods in foreign parts or at sea, bills of lading, India warrants, warehouse-keepers' certificates, warrants or orders for the delivery of goods, or any other documents used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising or purporting to authorise, either by indorsement or by delivery, the possessor of such document to transfer or receive goods thereby represented. . . ."

By the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, s. 17 :

"Nothing in this Act shall apply to any debentures issued by any mortgage, loan, or other incorporated company, and secured upon the capital stock or goods, chattels, and effects of such company."

R. Neville, Q.C., and Radford for the execution creditors.

Feb. 10, 1891. BOWEN, L.J., read the following judgment of the court: The question we have to decide is, whether both or either of the debentures before us, which are debentures of a joint-stock company limited, and create a charge on the floating real and personal property of the company, are void for non-registration under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, or the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, or either of such Acts.

So far as the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, is concerned, it seems to us that such debentures are expressly excepted from its operation by s. 17. We do not agree with Grove, J., and Huddleston, B., in Jenkinson v. Brandley Mining Co. (1), that the words "or other incorporated company" are limited to companies ejusdem generis with mortgage or loan companies, whatever these last-mentioned companies may be; but even if it were otherwise, we think that any incorporated company which is authorised to raise money on loan or mortgage would be for the purposes of this section ejusdem generis with a "mortgage or loan company." We see no reason for doubting that the Standard Manufacturing Co., Ltd., is an incorporated company within that section.

The next question to be solved is, whether these debentures, or either of them, are bills of sale within s. 4, and bills of sale to which s. 3 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, applies. That these debentures are agreements by which a right in equity to a charge or security on personal chattels is conferred appears to be clear. But we are of opinion, nevertheless, that, on the true construction of the Act of 1878, the mortgages or charges of any incorporated company, for the registration of which statutory provision has already been made by the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, or the Companies Act, 1862, are not bills of sale within the scope of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

It is impossible to follow chronologically the legislation about bills of sale without observing that, until the passing of the Act of 1882, the scope of which embraces larger objects, the express and avowed design of the legislature had been to strike at the frauds perpetrated upon creditors by secret bills of sale. The title of the Bills of Sale Act, 1854, so states, and the preamble of that Act is as follows :

"Whereas frauds are frequently committed upon creditors by secret bills of sale of personal chattels, whereby persons are enabled to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances and possessed of property, and the grantees or holders of such bills of sale have the power of taking possession of the property of such persons to the exclusion of the rest of their creditors, for remedy whereof," etc.

Such corporate bodies as were at this time in existence were not bodies in the habit of committing frauds of this sort; and since corporations were not subject to the law of bankruptcy, that portion, at all events, of s. 1 of the Act of 1854, which was for the protection of assignees in bankruptcy, could not be applicable to corporations. Indeed, the definition of "apparent possession," which is of the essence of the Act of 1854, is so framed as to show that corporations were not actively, at all events, present to the mind of the draftsman who drafted

A the statute. Prior to the Act of 1854 the legislature had passed, in 1845, the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, which provided, in the case of mortgages and bonds of companies authorised by their special Act to borrow, for a register to be kept of such mortgages and bonds, and enacted that such register might be perused at all reasonable times by any of the shareholders or any mortgage or bond creditor of the company, or by any person interested in such mortgage or bond, without fee or reward. Between the Bills of Sale Act, 1854, and the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, the Companies Act, 1862, was passed, which, by s. 43, provides for the registration by companies of the mortgages and charges specifically affecting their property.

B At the date of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, debentures which charged the property of such companies were well known in the commercial world. Having regard to the provisions already made by statute for their registration, such documents could hardly be described as secret or as belonging to the class of documents by which frauds were perpetrated upon creditors by secret bills of sale. They are not really, therefore, within the mischief of the Act of 1878. We cannot think that the legislature could have intended in the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, to have interfered by merely general words with such well-known commercial instruments, and it seems to us that the canon of construction laid down in Stradling v. Morgan (3), and cited by the Lord Chancellor in Cox v. Hakes (4), may be invoked with regard to the present controversy (1 Plowd. at p. 205a):

E "From which cases it appears that the sages of the law heretofore have construed statutes quite contrary to the letter in some appearance, and those statutes which comprehend all things in the letter they have expounded to extend but to some things, and those which generally prohibit all people from doing such an act they have interpreted to permit some people to do it, and those which include every person in the letter they have adjudged to reach to some persons only, which expositions have always been founded on the intent of the legislature, which they have collected sometimes by considering the cause and necessity of making the Act, sometimes by comparing one part of the Act with another, and sometimes by foreign circumstances. So that they have ever been guided by the intent of the legislature, which they have always taken according to the necessity of the matter and according to that which is consonant to reason and good discretion."

G Neither the cause nor necessity for the Bills of Sale Acts, 1854 and 1878, nor a comparison of the various sections, drive us to the interpretation that such documents are included. We have said that a comparison of the various sections of the Act of 1878 does not lead to any other conclusion. We may even say that such a comparison fortifies the opinion at which we have arrived. Without going so far as to decide that no corporation can be under any circumstances within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, we may point out that the language of ss. 4, 10, and 12 shows that the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, was not dealing specifically with corporations, although it may be that the language of s. 3 is wide enough to include the bills of sale of a corporation, a view which has tacitly, as we are aware, been assumed in many decided cases to be correct. The language employed in these other sections is certainly not felicitous language to be applied in the case of corporations, and warrants, we think, the observation that the debentures of companies I were not actively present to the mind of the draftsman of the Act.

The view that debentures like the present are not within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, was that adopted by POLLOCK, B., in Welsted & Co., Ltd. v. Swansea Bank, Ltd. (5), and by the Lord Chief Justice and WILLS, J., in Read v. Joannon (2); see also Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co. (6), and Levy v. Abercorris Slate and Slab Co. (7). We agree with this view, and we think that this appeal should be allowed, with costs both here and below, on the ground that the mortgages or charges of any incorporated company, for the registration of which other provisions have been made by the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, or the Companies Act, 1862, are not within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (North, J.), June 23, August 8, 1894]

On June 1, 1894, an injunction was granted in the Chancery Division restraining H. from having any communication with M., a female infant who had been made a ward of court, and directing H. to appear before the court on June 6. On that day H. appeared, and it was then proved that he and M. had been married some weeks before. The judge being satisfied that the marriage was valid, stayed the operation of his former order. H. on leaving the court concocted with a friend a paragraph purporting to be an account of what had taken place in private before the judge, but which was chiefly a puff of H.'s novels, and contained no statement of any fact which came out before the judge, except that H. and M. were married. This paragraph appeared in the "Star" of the same date. A paragraph to the same effect appeared the next day in the "Morning," and was copied in the "Pall Mall Gazette," and the "People." In the last three papers, however, it did not appear that the matter had been heard in private, and the editors stated that they did not know it was so heard. Motions were made to commit the publishers of all four papers, H., and his friend the author of the paragraph in the "Star."

Held: it was contempt of court to publish an account of any proceedings which a judge had ordered to be heard in private; however in the case of the publication in the "Star" the contempt was not premeditated or intentional and not of a serious character, and, apologies having been made, the justice of the case would be met by ordering H. and the publishers to pay the costs of the motions against them. The other four motions were frivolous and vexatious and would be dismissed with costs.

Contempt of Court—Attachment—Defence to motion—Truth of matter alleged to be contemptuous.

It is no defence to a motion to commit for contempt of court in publishing an account of proceedings held in camera that the matter published was true.

E Motions by the next friend of a female ward of court to commit the publishers of four newspapers, a contributor to one of them, and the ward's husband, for contempt of court in respect of matter published in the newspapers relating to legal proceedings in camera.

The ward having been forbidden by her parents to have any communication with the respondent Hueffer, suddenly left her home early in April, 1894. Her parents took proceedings to have her made a ward of court, and their solicitor wrote to the respondent Hueffer saying she had been made a ward. This was not accurate, for she was not actually made a ward until after the date of his letter. On June 1, 1894, NORTH, J., made an order restraining Hueffer from having any communication with the ward, and requiring him to appear before the judge on June 6. He attended on that day and NORTH, J., heard the matter in his private room. An affidavit by the respondent was produced in which he stated that he did not know, and had no reason to believe, that the young woman was a ward of court. This statement was false, as the solicitors to the ward's father had informed the respondent by letter of the fact and the respondent had acknowledged the receipt of the letter in writing. The respondent's solicitors then stated that the parties had been married two or three weeks previously. NORTH, J., agreed to stay the operation of his order if proper evidence of the marriage was produced and the hearing was adjourned for this to be done. When the matter again came before the judge on June 9 and the marriage certificate was produced, he declared himself satisfied that false statements made to the registrar as to the ward's age did not affect the validity of the marriage, although the respondent had laid himself open to criminal proceedings. He stayed the operation of the order, and declined to entertain any application to commit the respondent for contempt.

I In the meantime, on June 6, the following paragraph appeared in the "Star" newspaper :

"A Poet's Love Affair.—A Chancery Court Chapter of 'The Queen who Flew.'—In Chancery Court No. 2 to-day a rarely romantic story was unrolled before Mr. Justice NORTH, who sat in private to hear the action innocently set down as In re Martindale. The action was one to forbid a Miss Martindale, said to be a ward in Chancery, from perpetrating matrimony, the danger arising in connection with the attentions of a young poet and novelist who has already achieved a certain measure of distinction by 'The Shifting of the Fire' and other of his books—to wit, Mr. Ford H. Madox Hueffer, of Brook Green, W. Mr. Hueffer is well known as son of the late Dr. Hueffer, the once champion of Wagner in England and musical critic of "The Times," and as grandson of Mr. Ford Madox Brown. His intimate connection with the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood is also marked by the fact that his just-published novel 'The Queen who Flew' (significant title) is illustrated by Sir Edward Burne-Jones. The proceedings to-day might have been comparatively tame but for the fact that it turned out that there was no longer any Miss Martindale to protect. That lady became Mrs. Madox Hueffer some three weeks ago. The case stands adjourned for the present."

On the next morning, June 7, the following paragraph was published by the "Morning" newspaper:

"A Young Novelist's Romance.—A romance which has excited much interest in certain literary and artistic circles in London became more widely known yesterday as forming the subject of an action in Chancery Court No. 2 before Mr. Justice NORTH. The cause was In re Martindale, and the action taken to prevent the marriage of a Miss Martindale, a minor and a ward in Chancery. When the case came on it was found out that there was no longer a Miss Martindale to be protected, and an adjournment had to be made. In fact the lady had three weeks before been married to the lover whom it was sought to bar—Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer. Mr. Hueffer has already made a certain mark in fiction. He has also published a book of verse, and his last book, 'The Queen who Flew,' is illustrated by Sir E. Burne-Jones. Mr. Hueffer is son of the late Dr. Hueffer, the champion of Wagner and the well-known musical critic, and grandson of the late Ford Madox Brown."

This paragraph was copied into the "Pall Mall Gazette" of June 7, and the "People" newspaper of June 8.

On June 16 the court was moved on behalf of the ward's parents to commit the publishers of these four papers for contempt in publishing matters heard by the court in private. It appeared from the affidavits filed for the "Star" that the paragraph in that paper was in fact written by Mr. Perris, a contributor, from materials supplied to him immediately after the hearing on June 6 by Hueffer himself, and notices of motion to commit Hueffer and Perris also were then given. All the motions came on to be heard on June 23, 1894.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and G. Henderson for the motions.

S. Hall, Q.C., and G. Lawrence for the publishers of the "Morning."—Motions to commit ought not to be made unless there is some serious ground for committing the person moved against. The "Morning" published this paragraph in good faith, and the editor was wholly ignorant that the matter was heard in private at all. If there has been any contempt he apologises, but we submit there has been none. It has never been laid down that it is contempt to publish anything that has been heard in private so long as the publication does not extend to the facts on account of which a private hearing was ordered. Except these facts everything which passes in a court of justice is public property and may be published. This publication could not interfere with the course of justice.

S. Hall, Q.C., and Vernon Smith for the "Pall Mall Gazette."

Butcher for the publishers of the "People."—There can be no contempt of court in publishing the result of proceedings in court, even if the proceedings were in camera. It cannot be contempt to publish information which is accessible from other sources. The only fact which is really disclosed by this paragraph is that two young people were married, and this marriage had been announced in "The Times" weeks before.

A Boome for the "Star" and for Perris. The court will not exercise its jurisdiction to commit for contempt against the editor of a newspaper, unless there is a wilful intention to prejudice a trial or interfere with the course of justice. The "Star" published this paragraph in good faith, and it could not possibly interfere with the course of justice.

Job Bradford for Mrs. Hueffer and the respondent Hueffer.

B All the respondents' counsel tendered full apologies from their clients in case the court thought any contempt had been committed.

Aug. 8, 1893. NORTH, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued: The material parts of the paragraph in the "Star" may be condensed into this: that on the day in question a rarely romantic story was unrolled before a judge in Chancery sitting in private with reference to a female ward, which proceedings might have been comparatively tame but for the fact that it turned out that the lady had been married to the respondent three weeks before.

C It was contended before me that the publication of this paragraph did not interfere with or tend to obstruct the course of justice. In this I agree. But this does not conclude the question whether it was a contempt or not. Articles have often been held to be in contempt of court on the ground that they had been published while litigation was pending, which would not have been in contempt if only published after the litigation had been closed. But there may be, and are, publications which amount to contempts of court, although they do not interfere with the course of justice and have been published when all proceedings are at an end—for instance, it would be idle to suppose that matters occurring with respect to a ward, which could not be published without contempt while the ward was an infant, could be published with impunity so soon as the ward had attained the age of twenty-one years.

E It was also with great energy contended before me that all proceedings in a court of justice ought to be public, and that there could not be any contempt in publishing what took place in court; but in that I do not agree. The general rule is an excellent one, that legal proceedings should be in public; and if it were departed from the great weight which legal decisions carry with them in this country would be deservedly diminished. But with this rule certain exceptions are proper and necessary. One ground of exception is that a public hearing would have the effect of disclosing what it is the whole object of the action to keep concealed, as in Andrew v. Raeburn (1); Mellor v. Thompson (2); or of making known to the world a secret process, as in Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Levinstein (3). The hearing in private wholly or in part of cases in which public decency and morality require it to be done are also familiar, not only in the Divorce Court but also in the ordinary criminal and civil courts, an instance of the latter being Malan v. Young (4) [but see Scott v. Scott, [1911-13] All E.R.Rep. 1]. So also cases relating to lunatics are constantly heard in private; and cases as to wards: see Ogle v. Brandling (5) in order that the lunatic or ward may not be prejudiced; and I cannot conceive a clearer contempt of court than that a party concerned, or any person, should proceed forthwith to make known to the world the very matter which the court had deliberately, in the exercise of its discretion, decided ought not to be published.

H It was said that Lawrence v. Ambery (6) was a decision to the contrary. In that case proceedings for a divorce on the ground of nullity had been heard in camera, and a newspaper published the result, viz., that a decree for dissolution had been pronounced. It was decided that such publication was not a contempt, as, of course, it was not, any more than the publication of the marriage, in the present case, in the marriage column of "The Times." But the case, if the very meagre report of it can be trusted, negatives the conclusion sought to be drawn from it; for, as I read it, if what had been published had been any part of what transpired when the court was sitting in camera, the result would have been different.

In the present case I do not believe that any contempt of court was intended, though this in itself would be no excuse for contempt actually committed. The paragraph inserted in the "Star" was so inserted without premeditation, having been concocted and handed in by the respondent Hueffer and his friend Perris merely as an advertisement for the former. Its vulgarity and bad taste are enhanced by the reference to the Court of Chancery and the sitting being in private—references obviously made without any regard to the credit of the lady for the purpose of attracting the attention of readers to a puff, which, if not thus embellished, would have been passed by unnoticed. The paragraph, so far as I have quoted it above, was intended to appear to be, and would be understood, as a concise statement of what took place in my private room; and the disclosure is held out as an inducement to the public to read the whole paragraph.

It was said that, as the statement that the marriage had taken place was quite true, it could not be a contempt to state that; but, if the question of contempt depended upon the truth or untruth of the matter published, it would result in this—that there would be no contempt in an accurate disclosure of what passed in camera, although there would be if the account was a fictitious one, which is absurd. If the element of untruth were necessary, it would be found here in the statement that a rarely romantic story was unrolled. The story was a sad and very commonplace one; and on the day referred to it was not opened or gone into at all. But, as I have already said, there was no contempt in announcing the fact that the ward had become the wife of the said respondent; the contempt was in purporting to give the public information, though meagre, of what the judge had decided ought not to be disclosed by determining to hear the case in private and excluding the public.

I do not regard the contempt as a serious one. At the same time it was not mitigated by the line of defence which counsel adopted, the boldness of which cannot be appreciated by anyone who did not hear it. At the same time, however, a proper apology was expressed if the court should be of opinion that a contempt had been committed. Looking at all the circumstances, I think that justice will be met by ordering the printer of the "Star" to pay the costs of the motion to commit him. The respondent Hueffer, who went from the court to his journalist friend and instigated him to write the paragraph in question and procure its insertion in the "Star," is equally responsible for the publication of the advertisement, and he also must pay the costs of the motion against him.

With regard to the other motions, I am much surprised that they have been made at all. I consider them vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court. In Plating Co. v. Farquharson (7) the court pointed out that motions to commit where there was no real ground for committing the party were mere waste of time and ought to be discouraged: see also the observations of the Court of Appeal in Hunt v. Clarke (8) to the same effect. I should certainly not hesitate to commit where a real ground for committal is shown, as in the case of a deliberate contempt; but these four motions seem to me puerile. As regards the respondent Perris, the composer of the paragraph in question, I do not suggest for a moment that the part he has taken in the transaction might not have been sufficient to render him liable to committal, if the contempt had been a flagrant one. But I think that, if action was necessary, the proceeding against the "Star" and the respondent Hueffer would have answered every purpose; and that it was not only unnecessary but vexatious to proceed against the writer. I, therefore, dismiss that motion with costs.

The other three motions were against Mr. Hosker, the publisher of a paper called "Morning;" Mr. Hurst, the publisher of the "Pall Mall Gazette;" and Mr. Gray, the publisher of a paper called the "People." The article in the "Morning" of June 7 does not show, and Mr. Hosker swears that he did not know, that the proceedings referred to were not in open court; the article in the "Pall Mall Gazette" of the same day states on its face that they were in open court; and that in the "People" of June 10 also was simply copied from that in

A the "Morning," and they were inserted without any knowledge or means of knowledge that the proceedings had been in private. I dismiss these motions with costs.

I have hesitated somewhat about the costs because of the line of defence adopted on behalf of the respondents; but, disapproving as I do of these motions having been launched at all, I think the costs should follow the result. I may add
B this, however, for the guidance of the respondents in the future, that if they really had done what their counsel asserted their right to do with impunity, I should certainly have committed every one of them.

Power of Attorney—Scope of authority—Strict construction—Authority conferred in express terms or by necessary implication—Borrowing of money on behalf of principal.

G

Powers of attorney must be construed strictly, and, if a question is raised as to the authority conferred by the power, it must be shown that, on a fair construction of the whole instrument, the authority in question is conferred in express terms or by necessary implication. There is no distinction in this respect between the law of Canada and the law of England.

H

Where a power of attorney authorised the agent to enter into contracts (i) for the purchase or sale of goods; (ii) the chartering of ships; (iii) the employment of agents or servants, and, as incidental thereto, to do certain specified acts and other acts of the same kind, "and to do execute and perform any other act matter or thing whatsoever which ought to be done executed or performed or which in the opinion of the said agent ought to have been done executed or performed in or about the business affairs of the" principal,

I

Held: the agent was not authorised to borrow money on behalf of the principal or to bind the principal by a contract of loan.

Bill of Exchange—Promissory note—Acceptance—Endorsement—"Per pro"—Notice of limited authority.

Any person who takes a bill of exchange or promissory note accepted or endorsed "per pro" has express notice that the acceptor or endorser has only a limited authority, and is bound at his peril to inquire into the extent of the authority.

Bill of Exchange—Forgery—Signature without authority—Abuse of authority by agent—Position of bona fide holder for value. A

Where a power of attorney in terms authorises the agent to endorse bills of exchange the fact that he has abused his authority cannot affect bona fide holders for value of negotiable instruments endorsed by him apparently in accordance with his authority.

Appeals by Bryant, Powis and Bryant, Ltd., from decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada. In the first case that court (CROSS, BABY and ROUTHIER, JJ., BOSSÉ and DOHERTY, JJ., dissenting) reversed a decision of the Superior Court (ANDREWS, J.); in the second case the court (CROSS, BABY, BOSSÉ and LA RUE, JJ.) unanimously affirmed the judgment of ANDREWS, J., in the Superior Court. F

Charles Griffiths Davies was appointed the agent of the appellants by a power of attorney which gave him authority to enter into contracts or engagements for three specified purposes: (i) the purchase or sale of goods, (ii) the chartering of vessels, and (iii) the employment of agents and servants, and, as incidental thereto, to do certain specified acts and other acts of the same kind, G

"and to do execute and perform any other act matter or thing whatsoever which ought to be done executed or performed or which in the opinion of the said agent ought to have been done executed or performed in or about the business affairs of the [appellants]." H

In the first case, Davies borrowed money for his own purposes, but, in the name of the appellants and professedly on their behalf, he gave as security promissory notes drawn in favour of the appellants and endorsed by him in the name of the appellants "per pro C. G. Davies." In the second case, he endorsed two bills of exchange in the name of the appellants "per pro C. G. Davies," which were discounted by the Quebec Bank in the ordinary course of business. I

A Mar. 4, 1893. LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The appellant in these appeals is a company, incorporated with limited liability under the statute of the United Kingdom known as the Companies Act, 1862. It was formed in 1885 for the purpose of taking over the business of the firm of Messrs. Bryant, Powis and Bryant, of London, Quebec, and Montreal, lumber merchants. On Jan. 1, 1888, the company discontinued the business of buying and shipping timber, which up to that time it had carried on in Quebec in succession to the firm of Bryant, Powis and Bryant, and thenceforth the company restricted its business in Quebec to making advances on the security of lumber and timber, principally if not solely in connection with the operations of a firm of lumber merchants trading as "Smith, Wade & Co."

C On the formation of the company one Charles Griffiths Davies, of Quebec, who had been agent and attorney for the firm of Bryant, Powis and Bryant, was appointed the agent and attorney of the company in Canada. The appointment was contained in a power of attorney, dated Nov. 25, 1885. Davies remained in the regular employment of the company at a fixed salary up to Jan. 1, 1888. He then went into business on his own account, and carried on business as broker and general commission and shipping agent, under the style of "C. G. Davies & Co."

D But he still acted for the company when occasion required, receiving a commission for his services. His power of attorney was not revoked or withdrawn, and the company continued to hold him out as their agent. In February, 1890, Davies left Quebec under the pressure of pecuniary difficulties. It was then discovered that he had taken advantage of his position as agent and attorney for the company to procure money on the credit of the company for his own private purposes.

E The company in consequence found itself exposed to heavy and unexpected demands, and there was a good deal of litigation, in the course of which various points were raised depending on the special circumstances of the particular case. That litigation has given rise to these two appeals which their Lordships will now proceed to consider separately.

BRYANT, POWIS AND BRYANT, LTD. v. LA BANQUE DU PEUPLE

F In this appeal the question is whether the company is to be charged with moneys obtained by Davies for his own purposes, but borrowed by him in the name of the company and professedly on their behalf.

The facts are not in dispute. On Oct. 1, 1889, Davies went to the bank, who had been at one time, but were not then, the bankers of the company, and asked the manager, M. Dumoulin, for a loan of $25,000 on account of the company, saying that it was required for the purpose of a remittance to be made by him on that day to the head office in London. The manager consented to make the advance on what is termed a "short loan." Davies drew a cheque on the bank in the name of the company, "per pro C. G. Davies," for $25,000. The cheque was paid as an overdraft, and as collateral security for its repayment Davies deposited with the bank three promissory notes, amounting together to $40,000 drawn by Smith, Wade & Co., in favour of Bryant, Powis and Bryant, Ltd., and endorsed in their name, "per pro C. G. Davies." On Oct. 5 Davies went to the bank again, and told the manager that he found that the sum of $25,000 more was required, and thereupon he obtained a further loan to that amount. The transaction was carried out in precisely the same manner as the former loan, and by way of collateral security Davies endorsed and deposited three further promissory notes of Smith, Wade & Co., amounting together to $35,000. Before Dec. 4, 1889, Davies paid the bank out of his own moneys $10,000 in reduction of the loan. On that day the six promissory notes, which then had become due, but had not been presented for payment, were returned to Davies, who gave in exchange two other promissory notes for $25,000 each, dated Sept. 28, 1889, and made by Smith, Wade & Co., to the order of the company, and endorsed in the name of the company, "per pro C. G. Davies." For these notes Davies took the following receipt:

"Quebec, Dec. 4, 1889. Received of Messrs. Bryant, Powis and Bryant, Ltd., through their agent here the following bills payable as collateral security for the payment of ($37,000) thirty-seven thousand dollars with interest at 7 per cent., viz.: S. W. & Co. p. note due Mar. 31 $25,000 dollars; S. W. & Co. p. note due Mar. 31 $25,000;—$50,000.—p. Auguste Labardie, pro manager Banque du Peuple, Quebec."

Before the two notes became due the company forbade Smith, Wade & Co. to pay the bank, and they also gave notice to the bank disclaiming liability, and calling upon the bank to hand over the notes to them. When the notes fell due the bank brought this action upon them against Smith, Wade & Co. and the company. Smith, Wade & Co. submitted themselves to the judgment of the court. The company disputed their liability on various grounds, and they also filed an incidental demand, claiming the promissory notes in question as their property.

The case came on to be heard before ANDREWS, J. The learned judge in an able and elaborate judgment decided in favour of the company, on the ground that the bank had notice that Davies was acting under a limited authority, and that the power of attorney of Nov. 25, 1885, from which alone Davies derived his authority, did not authorise him to borrow money in the name of the company. The other grounds upon which the company resisted the claim of the bank were rejected by the learned judge. As the arguments before their Lordships were substantially confined to the question of authority, it is not necessary to allude to them, beyond saying that in the course of the discussion the learned counsel for the appellant very properly disclaimed in express and unqualified terms any imputation of want of good faith on the part of the bank or on the part of M. Dumoulin.

On appeal, the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, by a majority of three to two, reversed the decision of ANDREWS, J., and condemned the company to pay to the bank the sum of $37,000 with interest from Mar. 31, 1890, and costs of suit. The learned judges who formed the minority in the Court of Appeal adopted and relied upon the judgment of ANDREWS, J. The views of the majority are expressed in the formal judgment pronounced by CROSS, J. That judgment proceeds upon the ground that the "specific powers" granted to Davies by the power of attorney

"did not necessarily imply the negation of the powers of general agency granted to and exercised by the said Charles G. Davies under the said power of attorney," and that the words used in the concluding part of the power of attorney,

"refer not specially to said special powers but to the business generally of the respondents [i.e. Bryant, Powis and Bryant, Ltd.] and by their terms give the said Charles G. Davies a discretion to do, execute, and perform any matter or thing which in the opinion of the said Charles G. Davies ought to have been done, executed, or performed in or about business of the respondents, therefore outside and beyond what had been otherwise provided for by the said power of attorney,"

On the appeal before this Board the learned counsel for the appellant did not seriously dispute the proposition that the words "per pro" in the acceptance or endorsement of a bill of exchange or promissory note amount to an express statement that the party so accepting or endorsing the bill or note has only a special and limited authority, and, therefore, that a person who takes a bill or note so accepted or endorsed is bound at his peril to inquire into the extent of the agent's authority: see Stagg v. Elliott (1), per BYLES, J. Nor was it disputed that powers of attorney are to be construed strictly; that is to say, that where an act purporting to be done under a power of attorney is challenged as being in excess of the

A authority conferred by the power, it is necessary to show that on a fair construction of the whole instrument the authority in question is to be found within the four corners of the instrument, either in express terms or by necessary implication. It was pointed out, indeed, that the decisions on which counsel for the appellant mainly relied in support of these propositions were decisions of English judges, but it was not shown that there is any difference in this respect between the law of Canada and the law of England. The provisions of the Civil Code of Lower Canada, and the Canadian authorities which were cited to their Lordships, appear to be in harmony with English law and English authorities.

B In the result, the argument was reduced to a consideration of the true construction and effect of the power of attorney of Nov. 25, 1885. It will, therefore, be necessary to state its provisions somewhat in detail. That instrument begins by reciting the formation of the company, to

D "undertake and carry on as successors to Messrs. W. Bryant, F. C. Bryant, and H. W. Powis. who were the founders of the company, the trade and business of wood and timber importers, brokers, merchants, and dealers then carried on by them in partnership together at London, Quebec, Montreal, and elsewhere, under the name or style of Bryant, Powis and Bryant, and for other purposes more particularly mentioned in the memorandum of association of the company."

It then recites the provisions of the articles of association authorising the appointment of an attorney, and proceeds as follows :

E "And whereas the directors deem it desirable in the interest of the company to appoint an agent and attorney to represent the company in Canada aforesaid, now know ye that the company doth hereby appoint Charles Griffiths Davies, of Desprairie Street, in the city of Quebec, Canada aforesaid, to be the true and lawful attorney of the company, for and in the name and on behalf of the company to enter into any contract or engagement for the purchase or sale of goods and merchandise of whatever nature or kind, and for the charter and recharter of any ships or vessels, and for the engagement of all such agents, F clerks and servants as may be necessary for carrying on and conducting the business of the said company, and to draw and sign cheques on the bankers for the time being of the said company and to draw, accept, and endorse bills of exchange, promissory notes, bills of lading, delivery orders, dock warrants, coupons, bought and sold notes, contract notes, charterparties, accounts, current G accounts, sales, and other documents which shall in the opinion of the said attorney require the signature or endorsement of the company and also"

H to sue for and recover debts, to demand and obtain delivery of goods belonging to the company, and generally to act for the company in and about the recovery of debts and the delivery of goods in all respects as fully and effectually as the company could itself do, to give receipts, to bring and defend and compromise actions;

I "also to enter into, make, sign, seal, execute, deliver, acknowledge and perform any contract, agreement, deed, writing or thing that may in the opinion of the said agent or attorney be necessary or proper to be entered into, made, signed, sealed, executed, delivered, acknowledged or performed for effectuating the purposes aforesaid or any of them, and for all or any of the purposes aforesaid to use the name of the company"

then follow the words quoted in the judgment of the Court of Appeal

"and to do execute and perform any other act matter or thing whatsoever which ought to be done executed or performed or which in the opinion of the said agent or attorney ought to have been done executed or performed in or about the business affairs of the company."

To put it shortly, the power of attorney authorised Davies to enter into contracts or engagements for three specified purposes: (i) the purchase or sale of goods; (ii) the chartering of vessels; and (iii) the employment of agents and servants; and as incidental thereto, or consequential thereon, to do certain specified acts and other acts of the same kind as those specified. A

If the instrument be read fairly, it does not, in their Lordships' opinion, authorise the attorney to borrow money on behalf of the company, or to bind the company by a contract of loan. It appears to their Lordships that the words quoted in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench are to be read in connection with the introductory words of the sentence to which they belong, "for all or any of the purposes aforesaid." So read, the words in question do not confer upon the agent powers at large, but only such powers as may be necessary, in addition to those previously specified, to carry into effect the declared purposes of the power of attorney. Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed, and the judgment of ANDREWS, J., restored. The respondents will pay the costs of the appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench and the costs of this appeal. B

BRYANT, POWIS AND BRYANT, LTD. v. QUEBEC BANK D

The question raised in the appeal of Bryant, Powis and Bryant, Ltd. v. Quebec Bank may be disposed of very shortly. The appeal is from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada affirming the decision of ANDREWS, J., who held the company liable to the bank in respect of two bills of exchange endorsed in the name of the company, "per pro C. G. Davies," and discounted by the bank in the ordinary course of business. In the discussion at the Bar it was conceded by counsel for the appellant that the bank were bona fide holders for value, and the argument, as in the previous case, was substantially confined to the question of Davies' authority. The authority of Davies as the agent and attorney of the company was derived from the power of attorney of Nov. 25, 1885, which has been fully stated already. That instrument in terms authorises the attorney to endorse bills of exchange. Their Lordships agree with ANDREWS, J., that the fact that Davies abused his authority and betrayed his trust cannot affect bona fide holders for value of negotiable instruments endorsed by him apparently in accordance with his authority. The law appears to their Lordships to be very well stated in the Court of Appeal of the State of New York, in President, etc., of Westfield Bank v. Cornen (2), cited by ANDREWS, J., in his judgment in another case brought by the Quebec Bank against the company. The passage referred to is as follows: E

"Whenever the very act of the agent is authorised by the terms of the power, that is, whenever by comparing the act done by the agent with the words of the power, the act is in itself warranted by the terms used, such act is binding on the constituent, as to all persons dealing in good faith with the agent; such persons are not bound to inquire into facts aliunde. The apparent authority is the real authority." F

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs. H

An infant, by a marriage settlement dated Oct. 16, 1883, covenanted to settle after-acquired property. He came of age on Nov. 19, 1883. On May 14, 1887, his father died, and he became entitled under his will to a large sum of money, to which the covenant applied. On July 31, 1888, he repudiated the settlement. In an action by the trustees of the settlement against the infant, the infant said in evidence that he did not know, or did not remember, or that it was not present to his mind, that there was this covenant in the settlement to settle after-acquired property.

Held: as an infant he was entitled to repudiate the settlement if he did so within a reasonable time of attaining his majority; in measuring what was a reasonable time he was not entitled to wait until an actual sum of money had come to him to which the covenant would apply, and, further, it was wholly immaterial that he did not remember or had not acquainted himself with the nature of the obligations which he had undertaken; on the facts the repudiation had not been made within a reasonable time; and, therefore, the covenant was binding.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY, BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ.), reported sub nom. Carter v. Silber, [1892] 2 Ch. 278, reversing a decision of ROMER, J., reported [1891] 3 Ch. 553.

On Oct. 16, 1883, a settlement was executed in contemplation of a marriage between Martin Albert Silber and Lady Lucy Vaughan. At the time of the execution Martin Albert Silber, the intending bridegroom was an infant; he did not come of age until Nov. 19, 1883, just over a month afterwards. By the deed his father Albert Marcius Silber covenanted to pay the trustees of the settlement £1,500 a year,

"during the life of Lady Lucy Vaughan and during such further period (if any) as there should be living any child or grandchild of the intended marriage."

The trustees were to pay the yearly sum of £1,500 to Martin Albert Silber during his life, or until he should become bankrupt. The other provisions were for the most part such as commonly found in settlements of this description. By the settlement it was further agreed and declared that if Martin Albert Silber then was, or if he or the trustees for the time being should become, entitled to any property under any settlement executed or to be executed by Albert Marcius Silber or under any appointment made or to be made in exercise of any power in any such settlement, contained, or to be contained, or under or by virtue of the will of Albert Marcius Silber, or the will of Amelia Silber his wife, or any codicil thereto or by virtue of the intestacy of either of them, then unless such settlement or appointment or will or codicil, should otherwise direct, such property if not thereby given to the trustees should be vested in them upon such trusts, for sale or conversion as might be necessary or expedient, and subject thereto upon the trusts, and with and subject to the powers contained with respect to the moneys assured by, or to become payable under the policy of insurance, except that the ultimate trust should be in favour of Martin Albert Silber instead of Albert Marcius Silber (his father)

"and the amount or value of all property so acquired by the trustees, should be deemed to fall within the operation of the clause or provision lastly thereinbefore contained, and be applicable, accordingly by way of satisfaction pro tanto at the rate aforesaid of the yearly sum so covenanted to be paid by Albert Marcius Silber;"

The effect of this provision was that if any money was left by will to Martin Albert Silber that money was to pass to the trustees of the settlement and be held by them upon the trusts of the settlement, and if it came under the will of Albert Marcius Silber the father, to the extent to which it was sufficient to do so it was to be held by the trustees in lieu of the obligation and covenant to pay the £1,500 a year. The settlement having been executed, the infant having come of age on Nov. 19, 1883, the father made a will leaving his son residuary legatee. The father died on May 14, 1887, and his will and codicil were proved in July, 1887. There was nothing which could be regarded as a repudiation by Martin Albert Silber until July, 1888.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Haldane, Q.C., and Ingpen for the appellants.

Chadwyck-Healey, Q.C., and F. Thompson for the respondent, the executrix and trustee under the will of the testator.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., stated the facts and continued: It is not disputed that this contract executed and entered into by Martin Albert Silber was not absolutely void, but was voidable only—that is to say, that after he came of age it was as binding as if he had been of age at the time when he executed it, subject only to this, that the law enabled him to avoid his obligations provided he did so within a reasonable time. I did not understand the learned counsel for the appellants to dispute the proposition that the repudiation in order that the obligations may be got rid of must be within a reasonable time after the minor ceases to be

A a minor. The controversy has been as to what elements may be taken into account in determining whether more than a reasonable time has elapsed. In the present case, as I have shown your Lordships, there was no repudiation at all during the lifetime of the father. Down to the death of the father nothing had been done by the son; and it is impossible not to see that, if the son had repudiated in the lifetime of the father, it is in the highest degree probable that the disposition
B made by the father would have been different from what it was, as it is certain that the position of those taking, or at all events one of those taking, under the will of the father was altered for the worse by reason of this repudiation, if the repudiation was effective.

The first question is whether the infant was entitled to wait until an actual sum of money came to him to which this covenant could apply before he made
C the repudiation. I think that is a proposition which it is absolutely impossible to regard seriously—that this covenant being binding unless he repudiates it within a reasonable time he is entitled to wait to see how in respect of any particular sum of money the covenant will operate, and when he has made up his mind whether with regard to that sum of money it will be beneficial to him or not, he can then, and not till then, be said to have his proper opportunity
D of making the determination.

Then it is said that in considering whether a reasonable time has elapsed you must take into account the fact that he did not know what were the terms of the settlement and that it contained this particular covenant. He knew that he had executed a deed—he must be taken to have known that that deed though binding upon him could be repudiated when he came of age, and it seems to me
E that in measuring a reasonable time whether in point of fact he had or had not acquainted himself with the nature of the obligations which he had undertaken is wholly immaterial—the time must be measured in precisely the same way whether he had so made himself acquainted or not. I do not say that he was under any obligation to make himself acquainted with the nature of the deed, which, having executed it as an infant, he might or might not at his pleasure
F repudiate when he came of age—all I say is this, that he cannot maintain that the reasonable time when measured must be a longer time because he has chosen not to make himself acquainted with the nature of the deed which he has executed.

Having put aside those two contentions the only question comes to be, has a reasonable time been exceeded? The learned judges in the court below expressed their opinion that the period which elapsed, a period between four and five years,
G was more than a reasonable time. It is not at all necessary for your Lordships to lay down what would have been a reasonable time in this case—it is enough to say that, in my opinion, it is impossible to hold that the learned judges in the court below in saying that more than a reasonable time had elapsed have in any way erred. I, therefore, move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

H LORD WATSON.—This is, in my opinion, a very plain case, so plain that I shall not feel justified in detaining the House by any comments upon either the fact or the law. The law gave this appellant the privilege of repudiating the obligations which he had undertaken during his minority within a reasonable time after he came of age. The law laid no obligation upon him; it merely
I conferred upon him a privilege of which he might or might not avail himself as he chose. If he chooses to be inactive his opportunity passes away; if he chooses to be active the law comes to his assistance. In this case it humbly appears to me that the period of four years and eight months which he permitted to elapse before he took any steps in the matter cannot possibly be regarded as a reasonable time.

LORD HALSBURY.—I am of the same opinion. I should only like to add that I adopt the words of LINDLEY, L.J., who said in the court below :

"Whether the defendant could have repudiated the deed in five, or six, or nine months after he came of age I do not care to discuss; but to ask us to hold that he repudiated within a reasonable time is to ask us to hold that which no reasonable man could think of holding." A

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I agree. It seems to me that everyone who is of sufficient age and entitled to execute a deed, whether he be an infant or a man of full age, and who does execute a deed, must be treated as knowing the contents of the instrument which he executes whether that instrument be voidable or not; and therefore I think it is immaterial to inquire whether Mr. Martin Silber knew or did not know the particular covenant in question. I do not think he is entitled to any indulgence on the ground that he was not in fact aware of the obligation which he undertook. If Mr. Silber is not entitled to any special indulgence on account of ignorance of his own deed there is an end of the case, because no one would seriously contend, apart from special circumstances, that a period of more than four years is a reasonable time for a man to consider whether he will repudiate a deed or not. B C

LORD MORRIS.—I concur. D

LORD SHAND.—I am also of the same opinion, and I shall only add a few words to what has been said by your Lordships. I think it is reasonable to require of a minor that immediately after attaining his majority he should make himself acquainted with the terms and effect of such deeds as he has executed in minority, and that if he fails to do so and the rights of others have in the meantime been affected he must thereby be held to have lost his right of repudiation. I think that KAY, L.J., has put the point which I desire to emphasise as applicable to the present case very clearly in these words: E

"The appellant knew that he had executed a settlement; he says now 'I did not know' or 'I did not remember' or 'It was not present to my mind,' which probably would be a more correct way of stating the result of his evidence, 'that there was in this settlement a covenant by me to settle after-acquired property.' But he knew he had executed the settlement; he knew he was receiving the benefits under the settlement; and if he did not choose to look into the settlement and see to what extent it bound him and any property that might come to him, that cannot be taken as an excuse, in my opinion, for his not having exercised his right of disaffirmance some years at least before he attempted to do so." F G

I think the importance of laying down the rule as it has been stated by your Lordships, is very clearly illustrated in this case by the circumstance that if the appellant had intimated, shortly after he reached majority, that he declined to be bound by the stipulation in this marriage contract of which he now complains, I am satisfied his father would have made an entirely different settlement from that which he left to regulate the distribution of his estate at the time of his death. *Passing Off—Trade name—Assignment—Assignment of name for seven years—
Right of assignor to use or assign name after expiration of seven years—

John Forrest, a London watchmaker, inscribed the words "John Forrest, London" on the goods made by him. On his death in 1871 his executrix assigned his business and goodwill to C. & Co. who continued to use the name "John Forrest" on some of their watches. In 1874 C. & Co. granted to S. & Co. for seven years the sole right to use the name of "John Forrest" on watches made by them, and C. & Co. ceased to use the name for that period. After the expiration of the licence C. & Co. used the name on few, if any, of their watches. In 1890 they assigned all their estate and effects for the benefit of creditors, and in 1891 the trustee under the assignment assigned the business and goodwill to one Clemence. At the same time the trustee purported to assign to the plaintiff the name, title and goodwill of "John Forrest." The plaintiff claimed the sole right to make and sell watches with that name inscribed on them, and, in an action by him to restrain the defendant from selling watches so inscribed,

Held: (i) assuming that C. & Co. had acquired in 1871 the right to mark their goods with the name of "John Forrest," they had ceased to use the name for the period of the licence to S. & Co., and had never regained their right to it; (ii) as the assignment to the plaintiff in 1891 was not an assignment of the business of C. and Co., but merely of the right to use the name of "John Forrest"; it was, consequently, a mere assignment in gross, and as such was invalid; and, therefore, the action failed.

From the year 1851 onwards a man called John Forrest carried on business A as a watch and chronometer maker at Clerkenwell, London, and stamped on the face of his watches "John Forrest, London," and on the back "John Forrest, chronometer maker to the Admiralty, London, E.C." On Feb. 15, 1871, John Forrest died, and by an indenture of June 12, 1871, his administratrix, Georgiana
Leitch, assigned to persons trading under the name of Carley & Co., at 30, Ely Place, London, B

"all that the trade and goodwill and other the interest of the said [administratrix] in the business of a watchmaker carried on by the said John Forrest, deceased, and all the benefit and advantage thereof. . . ."

Carley & Co. never carried on business under the name of "John Forrest" or at any house or in any street where John Forrest ever carried on business. They C used the name up to February, 1874, by placing it on some watches which they sold to James Edey, of Peebles. On Feb. 7, 1874, Carley & Co. purported to grant to Henry Stuart & Co., Ltd., of Liverpool, the sole right to make watches with the name of "John Forrest" thereon for the term of seven years from that date. Accordingly, during these years Henry Stuart & Co., in the course of their watchmaking business, manufactured and sold watches with the above- D mentioned inscriptions thereon; and Carley & Co. ceased to put the name "John Forrest" on any of their watches. After the expiration of the seven years, and until their failure, Carley & Co. only put the name "John Forrest" on a few watches, so that there was no substantial sale of them.

About the year 1888 the plaintiff marked watches made by himself with the name "John Forrest, chronometer maker to the Admiralty, London, E.C." E
On Aug. 14, 1890, Carley & Co. assigned the whole of their estate and effects to George Norton Read for the benefit of their creditors. On Feb. 28, 1891, Read assigned to one Clemence the business carried on by Carley & Co., and the goodwill, and the lease and premises at which Carley & Co. had carried on their business.
Immediately afterwards, on the same Feb. 28, 1891, Read purported to assign, so far as he lawfully could, to the plaintiff, for a sum of £20, the name, title, and F goodwill of the business of John Forrest, trading under the style or title of "John Forrest, chronometer maker to the Admiralty, London, E.C." On the same day, the plaintiff issued a circular setting out that he had bought the name, title, and goodwill of "John Forrest," and that no authority existed in any other person than himself to register or use the said name. On the back of this circular was printed the address, G

"15, Northampton Square, Clerkenwell, London, E.C. Bought of John Forrest, wholesale watch manufacturer and chronometer maker to the Admiralty, established a century."

The plaintiff did not claim to be chronometer maker to the Admiralty. The defendant also sold watches at Coventry, stamped with "Forrest," "John Forrest," H and "John Forrest, London," and by advertisements and invoices represented that he was the said John Forrest, or his successor in business. The plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from so doing.

Cur. adv. vult. I

January 22, 1894. ROMER, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts, found on the evidence that there was a wholly unsubstantial sale of "John Forrest" watches by Carley & Co. after the termination of the seven years' licence, and he continued: Assuming that the assignment to the plaintiff could be said to pass anything, having regard to the prior assignment to Clemence, it is clear that it could only pass the right to use the name "John Forrest" as a thing in gross, wholly unconnected with any real or substantial business. It is under this

A assignment that the plaintiff claims. No doubt the plaintiff, who was and is a watch manufacturer at Coventry, ventured this small sum of £20 for such right to the name of John Forrest as Read might be able to assign, because he had some experience in the name of John Forrest. That experience was derived from the fact that prior to the failure of Carley & Co., and without any leave either sought or given, he had made for four different customers watches with the words B "John Forrest, London," put upon them by their directions. The plaintiff never has carried on business in London, or under the name "John Forrest," nor has he, since the so-called assignment to him, ever used the name except by placing it upon some of his watches.

Under these circumstances, has the plaintiff the right contended for by him? I think not, and for the following reasons. Carley & Co. undoubtedly bought C the goodwill of John Forrest's business. Speaking generally, a purchaser of a business, if he continues it, has the right to use the trade name and trade marks of the business in any way he pleases which is not calculated to deceive. In particular, as a rule, the purchaser may mark goods made by him in the course of that business with the name of the vendor, although the vendor, or his workmen, did not make or assist in making such goods, and by so marking the goods D the purchaser would not be considered as doing that which was calculated to deceive his customers or the public. The reason of that is, that in most cases, and especially where the purchaser is continuing the business in the vendor's name, the mark might fairly be held to be only a representation that the goods were manufactured in the course of the business without any representation as to the persons by whom that business was being carried on, and there would be no substantial risk of deception. But in cases where deception would arise, or would probably E arise, from the marking of the vendor's name, or from the way in which it was marked, then the marking would be fraudulent, and the purchaser could not be heard to say, after a course of such fraudulent marking, that thereby his goods so marked had come to represent goods made by him as the vendor's successor in business. For instance, when the goods sold in a business are of an artistic F character, and during the vendor's time acquired their reputation and depended for their value upon his personal skill, then, if his retirement from the business were kept secret, a purchaser of his business would not be entitled to sell the goods not made by the vendor marked with his name.

I will assume in the present case, in favour of the plaintiff, that until Feb. 7, 1874, the watches made by Carley & Co., and marked by them with John Forrest's name, G were rightly so marked, and that up to that date they could honestly say that watches so marked represented goods made either by John Forrest or by his successors in business. I say I will assume this, as I wish to guard myself from the supposition that I so decide having regard to the facts, and in particular to the fact that Carley & Co. marked their watches not only with the words "John Forrest, London," but also with the description "John Forrest, chronometer H maker to the Admiralty." I think that description was marked in order to set forth the personal qualification of the maker and as a matter of importance, and in order to impress those into whose hands the watches should come with the idea that the watches were made by or under the supervision of one holding the responsible position of chronometer maker to the Admiralty. Even if Carley & Co. could justify their marking of the name of John Forrest on the ground I that it only meant themselves as the successors of John Forrest, I do not see how they could at the same time with propriety identify themselves with the description of chronometer makers to the Admiralty when they were nothing of the kind.

But, passing this over, and on the assumption I have mentioned, how did matters stand on the expiration of the seven years' licence? During these seven years Henry Stuart & Co., Ltd., were expressly authorised by Carley & Co. to manufacture and sell watches stamped with the name of "John Forrest, London." That company, who carried on business in their own name, were not John Forrest or successors in the business of John Forrest, and were carrying on business in Liverpool, and not in London, and this to the knowledge of Carley & Co. How, after that, could Carley & Co. be heard to assert that the name of "John Forrest, London," on watches, still represented and meant that the watches were made either by John Forrest or by his successors in business? So to assert would be to admit that they had authorised the Liverpool company to commit a fraud on the public. The deed of Feb. 7, 1874, did not assign or purport to assign any business or any part of the business of Carley & Co. to the Liverpool company. It was a mere grant of a licence to use the name of John Forrest, and I need scarcely say that, apart from the other objections to the licence purported to be granted, a trade name or mark cannot validly be assigned in gross. When the licence expired, Carley & Co., who had ceased during the seven years to use the name "John Forrest" in any way whatever in their business, had, in my opinion, lost any right they might previously have had to say that, any person marking watches "John Forrest" thereby represented that they were watches manufactured by them or in the course of their business: Re Wood's Trade-mark, Wood v. Lambert and Butler (1), and in particular the observations of LINDLEY, L.J. (32 Ch.D. at p. 260).

This being the position of affairs at the end of the licence, certainly Carley & Co. did not by the time of their failure regain any right, even if they could possibly have done so, for, as I have pointed out, there was in the meantime no substantial manufacture or sale by them of watches marked. And if Carley & Co. at the date of their failure had no such right, they could not assign it to Read, nor could Read assign it to the plaintiff. And if Carley & Co. had no such right at the time of their failure, they could not have then obtained an injunction against the defendant for stamping watches with the name "John Forrest," nor could the plaintiff acquire through them the right to such an injunction, even if he had acquired all their business, for all that the defendant is doing that can be complained of by the plaintiff is marking his watches with John Forrest's name. That is, in my opinion, a very improper proceeding, because it is a fraud on the public, but it does not enable the plaintiff to support this action. To entitle the plaintiff to an injunction he must have been able to establish (there being no question of trade mark) that such marking by the defendant was calculated to deceive the public or customers into the belief that the goods so marked were goods made in the course of the business belonging to the plaintiff. And this he could not do for the reasons I have pointed out.

But the matter does not stop there. Even assuming that Carley & Co., or Read as their trustee, could, if no assignment had been made, have restrained the defendant, the plaintiff, who, in my opinion, can only claim to be a mere assignee in gross of the right to the name "John Forrest," cannot sue the defendant. The plaintiff is in no real or true sense an assignee of the business of Carley & Co. or of any severed or severable part of it. The wording of the so-called assignment to him is relied on by him, and in particular the use of the word "goodwill." But the words used meant nothing more than that Read purposed to transfer, if and so far as he could, to the plaintiff, the right to the mere name "John Forrest," and such advantages, if any, as could be said to attach to such a right. As I have before pointed out, the right merely to use a name as a property in itself cannot be validly assigned so as to confer rights as against the public, nor can any advantages whatever as against the public attach to any attempted assignment of the sort.

Lastly, I should point out that, ever since the death of John Forrest, Carley & Co. and those claiming through them have never used the name "John Forrest" except by stamping it on goods—that is to say, as a trade mark. They could not insist that it was or is a trade mark or claim rights on that ground for many reasons, one of which is, that they have never registered or applied it under the Trade Marks Acts; and, not being able to do this, still less could or can they do what in substance the plaintiff is seeking to do in this action—namely, treat a

- A name as being property in itself which gives a right of action against any person using the name without their permission, wholly irrespective of any other consideration. I need not deal with further defences raised by the defendant. I have stated sufficient to show why, in my judgment, the action should be dismissed, and I accordingly dismiss it. But, having regard to the conduct, or rather misconduct, of the defendant in relation to his use of the name "John Forrest,"
- B I dismiss the action without costs.

Motion for a declaration that two payments by a bankrupt of £50 each to Wilson, Pease & Co. constituted fraudulent preferences and for an order that the sums should be paid back to the trustee in bankruptcy.

On Aug. 5, 1892, a petition was presented against the debtor, on which, on Sept. 5, 1892, a receiving order was made. On Aug. 13 and Sept. 13 the debtor made two payments of £50 each to Wilson, Pease & Co., of Middlesbrough, with whom the debtor had had for many years business transactions. A

Aug. 9, 1893. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., read the following judgment. This was a motion for a declaration that two payments of £50 each, made by the bankrupt on Aug. 13 and Sept. 5 to Wilson, Pease & Co. constituted a fraudulent preference by the bankrupt of Wilson, Pease & Co. over his other creditors, and for an order that Wilson, Pease & Co. should forthwith pay over the two sums of £50 to the trustee in bankruptcy. I am going to make the order asked for in this case, but not quite upon the ground asked for in the notice of motion, for I consider that I may, without doing an injustice, treat the notice of motion as amended. All parties have come here to try the question whether Wilson, Pease & Co. are entitled to retain these two sums of £50, and I am going to decide that they are not so entitled. F G

The motion is based on what is known as the fraudulent preference section, i.e., s. 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The facts are really not in dispute. There is no doubt that the bankrupt was unable to pay his debts and made these payments to prefer Wilson, Pease & Co. It was, however, said that s. 48 did not apply, as the closing words of the section make it only apply where a bankruptcy petition is presented within three months after the payments in question, and it was said that, as the payments in question were made after the presentation of the petition it was quite impossible for the section to apply; in other words, the section has no application, except to cases where the petition is subsequent in date to the payments sought to be set aside, and here it was prior in date. I quite agree. I should have liked to have found a way out of it, but I cannot do so, and, therefore, so far as s. 48 is concerned, this is not a fraudulent preference. H I

Let us look, however, at the state of things here. The trustee's title relates back to the petition, these payments were made after the petition, and, therefore, they were prima facie payments by the bankrupt to the creditors out of the moneys belonging to the trustee, and not out of his own moneys. In answer to this it was said that the transaction was covered by s. 49, which is known as the protective section. It was said that this payment was made before the receiving

A order, and no one alleges that Wilson, Pease & Co. had notice of any act of bankruptcy. I agree; at the same time I am going to hold that Wilson, Pease & Co. are not entitled to the benefit of s. 49. I should first point out that an argument was addressed to me based on s. 95 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which provided that:

B “(1) any . . . payment of money . . . made by any bankrupt in good faith and for valuable consideration, before the date of the order of adjudication, with any person not having at the time of the making of such disposition of property notice of any act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt and available against him for adjudication,”

C was protected. My attention was called to the fact of the omission of the words “good faith” from s. 49 of the Act of 1883, and I was told that, therefore, protection was to be given to payments made in bad faith. I shall not hold so, and do not adopt the argument. To return, then, to what I was saying. Section 48, which is the fraudulent preference section, tells us under what circumstances the law will avoid a fraudulent preference, and I agree with counsel for Wilson, Pease & Co. that I have no right to avoid a payment as a fraudulent preference under other circumstances than those defined in the section.

D I am not now asked to avoid a payment as a fraudulent preference; what has happened is, that there has been a disposition of money which prima facie did not belong to the bankrupt, but to his trustee, and I am asked to protect that transaction. I deny that, because s. 48 defines the circumstances under which I can avoid payments as fraudulent preferences, that, therefore, I am to give protection to all cases outside the section; that is to say, that to every case which does not come within s. 48 I am bound to give the benefit of the protection afforded by s. 49. I am never bound to give the benefit of the protective section to any transaction which is contrary to the policy of the bankruptcy law, and this transaction was one of that kind. LORD MANSFIELD one hundred years ago laid down the law as to fraudulent preference, but because the law as to fraudulent preference was subsequently embodied in a section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, this does not do away with the fact that the present transaction was a common law fraud. I am, therefore, not bound to give the benefit of the protective section to any such transaction. In my opinion, these moneys were the property of the trustee, and s. 49 does not enable Wilson, Pease & Co. to keep them.

SWYNY v. HARLAND

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Davey, L.JJ.), February 12, 1894]

[Reported [1894] 1 Q.B. 707; 63 L.J.Q.B. 415; 70 L.T. 227; 42 W.R. 297; 10 T.L.R. 276; 38 Sol. Jo. 256; 9 R. 210]

Solicitor—Undertaking—Enforcement—Stay of execution upon terms—Payment of costs to solicitor upon undertaking to repay if appeal successful—Appeal successful, but execution stayed pending further appeal.

In an action before an official referee the plaintiff was successful and the defendant appealed to the Divisional Court. A stay of execution pending the appeal was granted upon the terms that the defendant would pay into court the amount for which judgment had been given against him, and also would pay the costs to the plaintiff's solicitor upon his personal undertaking to repay the same if the appeal was successful. The appeal before the Divisional Court was successful, but execution was stayed pending an appeal by the plaintiff to the Court of Appeal. The defendant applied to the Court of Appeal for an order that the plaintiff's solicitor should pay the costs in accordance with his undertaking.

Held: as the appeal to the Divisional Court had been successful, the event had happened which made the undertaking enforceable, and the fact that a stay of execution had been granted by the Divisional Court did not affect the undertaking.

Notes. As to terms on which a stay of execution is granted, see 16 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 34, 35; and for cases see 21 DIGEST (Repl.) 540, 541.

- (2) Re Woodfin and Wray (1882), 51 L.J.Ch. 427; 30 W.R. 422; 42 Digest 336, 3795.

Application by the defendant that the plaintiff's solicitor might be ordered to comply with an undertaking he had given for the repayment of costs pursuant to an order of the Court of Appeal.

The action was tried before an official referee, who gave judgment for the plaintiff for a large amount, and for the plaintiff upon the defendant's counterclaim. The defendant asked for a stay of execution pending an appeal to a Divisional Court, which was refused both by the official referee and by the Divisional Court. The defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal, where an order was made that execution should be stayed pending the appeal to the Divisional Court, upon payment into court of the amount for which judgment had been given, and payment of the costs, as soon as taxed, to the plaintiff's solicitor upon his personal undertaking to repay the same if the appeal proved successful. The defendant complied with these terms. Upon the hearing of the appeal in the Divisional Court, the judgment of the official referee in favour of the plaintiff was set aside, and judgment entered for the defendant upon the claim and counterclaim. Upon the application of the plaintiff, the Divisional Court granted a stay of execution pending an appeal to the Court of Appeal. The defendant applied to the Court of Appeal for an order upon the plaintiff's solicitor to repay to the defendant the costs which had been paid to him upon the above undertaking.

Bigham, Q.C., for the plaintiff.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The undertaking given by the plaintiff's solicitor in this case was given to the court. The solicitor could not have been obliged to give this

A undertaking, but he elected to give it for the good reason that by giving it he got the amount of his costs paid over to him by the defendant. The only question then is: What is the effect of this undertaking? The order applied only to the appeal which was then pending before the Divisional Court. In that appeal the defendant was successful. The mere fact that there has been a stay of execution upon the judgment of the Divisional Court upon the appeal before them does not make it an imperfect judgment in favour of the defendant upon that appeal. I think that the order asked for must be made.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Applications to stay proceedings are frequently made to us in this court, and are often granted upon the terms as to costs that they shall be paid by the appellant to the respondent's solicitor upon his personal undertaking to repay such costs if the appeal is successful. The solicitor is not obliged in such a case to give the undertaking; if he does, it is a voluntary act upon his part, and he gives the undertaking in order to obtain payment of the costs. If he does give the undertaking, he is an officer of the court who voluntarily gives an undertaking, and on the faith of that undertaking execution is stayed upon those terms, and the application is granted. That undertaking is given in the face of the court, and is equivalent to an undertaking given to the court. What then are the consequences? If the undertaking is given to the court, the party in whose favour it is given may, if he has succeeded in his appeal, apply to the court to commit or attach the solicitor if he does not comply with the terms of his undertaking. In this case the application is not to commit or attach, but that the solicitor may be ordered to repay these costs. The appeal to the Divisional Court was successful. It is true that a stay of execution was granted by the Divisional Court, but the appeal was none the less successful. Therefore, the event has happened which makes this undertaking enforceable. The solicitor must repay these costs.

DAVEY, L.J.—I have no doubt whatever that, when a solicitor in a cause gives an undertaking in his character as a solicitor, the court will enforce such an undertaking by committal or attachment. There is no distinction between an undertaking as to damages, and an undertaking to repay money paid over to him. The court has, in my opinion, jurisdiction to enforce such an undertaking in a summary way. It is so stated in CHITTY'S ARCHBOLD'S PRACTICE (14th Edn.) p. 119:

G "Where a solicitor in an action gives an undertaking in his character of a solicitor, the court or a judge will enforce such undertaking or punish the breach of it in a summary way."

Re Hilliard, Ex parte Smith (1) is an authority for that statement, and so also is Re Woodfin and Wray (2), in which an undertaking by solicitors to pay an agreed sum for costs as a condition of obtaining the release of their client from prison, was enforced by the court in a summary way, and an order made upon the solicitors to pay the costs which they had undertaken to pay. I am of opinion, therefore, that this application must be granted.

Action for a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to a charge on certain property and interests belonging to the defendant.

Cyrus Legg, who died on Sept. 19, 1889, by his will, dated June 5, 1886, devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust to sell and convert, and to invest the proceeds thereof, upon trust for the benefit of the children of his late sister, Mary Ann Prentice, in the events and under the circumstances therein mentioned. On the death of the testator, the defendant, as one of the children of M. A. Prentice, became entitled to certain reversionary and contingent interests under the will. On Sept. 5, 1890, the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant for £85 8s. 4d. in an action in the Queen's Bench Division, and was subsequently appointed receiver of the defendant's interests under the will. Those interests being of a contingent and reversionary nature, the plaintiff had been unable to obtain payment of his judgment debt. He, therefore, brought the present action, claiming a declaration that under and by virtue of his judgment and of the receivership order he had a charge upon the defendant's shares and interests under the will for the sum of £85 8s. 4d., with interest and costs; that that charge might be enforced by the sale of such shares and interests; and that the proceeds of the sale might be applied in payment thereof.

J. Henderson for the defendant.

STIRLING, J.—This is an action without precedent. The plaintiff is a judgment creditor, who has issued execution against the defendant, has been unable to recover, and has obtained an order appointing himself receiver of the defendant's interests under a will. Those interests are reversionary and contingent interests in real and personal estate given upon trust for sale and conversion. Therefore, in the eye of

A the court, the fund of which the plaintiff has been appointed receiver is personal estate. It is admitted that s. 13 of the Judgments Act, 1888 [rep. Law of Property Act, 1925: see now Administration of Justice Act, 1956, ss. 34, 35, 36], does not apply, as it is confined to land, and the plaintiff accordingly has no remedy by petition under the Judgments Act, 1864 [rep. Administration of Justice Act, 1956] and cannot get a sale. Under these circumstances he seeks to realise the property

B by obtaining a declaration that he has a charge upon it, and that it ought to be sold and the proceeds applied in payment of his debt.

I cannot see my way to assist the plaintiff, although I would willingly do so if I could. He has got a receivership order, under which, when the property falls into possession, he will be entitled to receive both income and capital on the footing of equitable execution, and further than that he cannot go at present. Previously

C to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, in order to obtain the appointment of a receiver it was necessary for the judgment creditor to institute a fresh action; now it can be obtained in the same action as that in which judgment is recovered, but no case has been produced in which the court has gone on to declare a charge. Indeed, in Westhead v. Riley (1), CHITTY, J., declined to make any declaration of a charge, though asked to do so, thinking no doubt that he had no power. By s. 13

D of the Judgments Act, 1888, a charge upon the real estate of a judgment debtor was for the first time created, and it was to take effect in favour of a judgment creditor who had entered judgment. But there is no corresponding enactment applicable to personal estate. I cannot see my way to give judgment in the plaintiff's favour, for I am of opinion that I should be exceeding the jurisdiction I possess if I were to declare and enforce a charge in this case. The law may be

E defective, but I cannot extend it. The action must be dismissed, but the defendant's costs will be set off against the debt due by him to the plaintiff.
